Another explanation for the snail's pace progress is the "credibility gap" in enforcement. When Federal officials say they mean business and will demand compliance, local authorities simply don't believe it. They don't believe it because there is, under the existing administration of the guidelines, an official tolerance of tokenism. The superintendent believes he can beat the house because he has done it in the past. Generally speaking, he will do what is required (but no more) rather than lose Federal funds, provided that it is required. To bring about social change in the South, it is essential that the change appear to be inevitable.

The law requires nothing less than that the formerly de jure dual school system be completely dismantled ("lock, stock and barrel"), and HEW cannot accept less. The law was clearly stated by Judge Wisdom in the Jefferson County case when he wrote:

> "As Brown dictates, the decree places responsibility on school authorities to take affirmative action to bring about a unitary, non-racial system. As the Constitution dictates, the proof of the pudding is in the eating: the proof of a school board's compliance with constitutional standards is the result -- the performance. Has the operation of the promised plan actually eliminated segregated and token-segregated schools and achieved substantial integration?"

The view that school administrators have the non-transferable duty to undo segregation has also been taken by the Sixth and Eighth Circuits (Bradley v. School Board of City of Richmond, 345 F2d 310, 322 and Northcross v. Board of Education, 302 F2d 818). "Affirmative action means more than telling (Negroes) 'You now have a choice'" -- Bradley, supra.

It may well be that local school authorities will have to review the placement of every pupil and the assignment of every teacher in their system in order to discharge their affirmative obligation. Every such placement or assignment must be based on sound educational considerations unrelated to race. Any placement not so supported requires notice of non-compliance.

We do not minimize the difficulties of administration. But if the law is as Judge Wisdom states it, then it is up to HEW to devise appropriate administrative procedures for its enforcement; and private agencies should call upon the Department to do so.

While we recognize that the prevailing political climate is not conducive to the immediate acceptance of the "one guideline" approach by the administration, it is nevertheless desirable for the private agencies to advocate it:

(1) We ought to be out in front of the consensus;

(2) The position is legally sound and responsive to the opportunity afforded by the opinion of the Fifth Circuit;

(3) It takes the burden of desegregation off Negro children and parents and puts it where it should be -- on school administrators;

(4) Ultimately, HEW will have to adopt this position, or one very close to it;

(5) The approach is dramatic, simple and easily understood, whereas the present guidelines are complicated, easily misunderstood and frequently misinterpreted;

(6) By creating pressure for more rigorous enforcement, we counteract pressure for little or no enforcement, thereby rendering the administrators of present policy more effective until an advanced position is adopted.

Henry Aaronson - The Fifth Circuit decision was "probably the most important decision since Brown vs Topeka."

Did not do away "freedom of choice" plans, but did recognize right to actually desegregated (non-dual) system. The Negro child has a right to more than a freedom to choose to go to a "white" school.

The court attached an order (decree) to the opinion requiring all districts to comply with requirements of the court - or a plan equally strong. HEW guidelines are minimal.

NAACP, Inc Fund is reopening all suits.

All students must exercise their freedom of choice. Other requirements - conspicuous ads, letters to parents, choice period etc. - are roughly the same as those of the guidelines. Anyone may get choice forms and copy of the notice. Once made, choice is binding for the entire year. (Must guard against thoughtless "choice.") In the event of overcrowding, assignment on basis of proximity. (Inc Fund will contend that the standard of overcrowding is the most crowded school in the system.) Transportation - must be given t. to nearest "white" school.

School officials responsible for protection of students exercising choice. New construction must be planned so as to effect desegregation. (Planned construction should be watched!) Re. faculty - language is general, but calls for steps to undo what has been done by reassigning teachers, and new teachers must be assigned without regard to race.

Districts must keep records by race for purposes of reporting performance.

Any student who is 15 or in 9th grade may exercise his own choice, which must be honored unless withdrawn by parent.

Session to Tax Political Stamina

By S. L. LATIMER JR.
The Columbia State
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

COLUMBIA, Jan. 7—The South Carolina General Assembly, trying to adjust for the first time to a two-party operation, meets Tuesday with a raft of hot potato issues on the agenda.

The issues themselves — regulation of liquor, highway safety legislation, reapportionment of the Senate and proposed election law changes—are enough to test the political stamina of the strongest legislator.

But now the Democratic majority must face these issues with one eye on the fledgling Republican minority. The 23 Republicans (there are 141 Democrats) have already displayed their determination to function as an organized minority. They have elected a floor leader and a whip and have demanded proportionate representation on all committees.

Sharp division between the two parties is expected, for though the GOP can pass nothing without Democratic aid, it will be trying to "make a record" for future campaign use.

FIRST BUSINESS Tuesday is organization, this being a new assembly.

Officially, there is no holdover structure, but there is little doubt that the older members who have held important posts in the past will cling to them. Certainly the organization will follow the lines laid down by the Democratic majority.

Sol Blatt will be reelected speaker and Rex Carter speaker pro-tem, the latter, if Blatt has his way, to be given more remuneration, and an expense account, something he had not had before.

President Pro-tem Edgar

SOUTH CAROLINA

A. Brown will preside in the Senate until the new lieutenant governor, former Sen. John C. West, is sworn in. The job has been vacant since Robert E. McNair was elevated to the post of chief executive in 1965.

SENATE committees run according to seniority, and are handled by caucus. In the House, the speaker has full authority to name committees, and Blatt says he will do so without regard to party, recognizing previous service of Republicans who defected to the GOP, and also a member's fitness for a particular committee, such as a lawyer on the judiciary.

There won't be much regular business transacted during the first week and as a matter of fact during the following week either, since the inauguration of Gov. McNair and the swearing-in of other state officers Jan. 18, and the attendant festivities, will pretty well shove all other business into the background.

Already there is talk of a short session, or at least a shorter one that has been the case in recent years. Speaker Blatt wants a speeded-up schedule but every year there is a cry for early adjournment, and plans to bring it about, but usually it is late April or May when sine die comes, and this no doubt will be the case again this year.

Atlanta Rushes to National Role

Mills B. Lane Jr. heads Citizens & Southern National Bank

Many Consider City a Business Mecca for the South

L.E. 11-16-64

By VARTANIG G. VARTAN

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA—"The city of Atlanta," Mills B. Lane Jr. asserts, "is a commercial venture."

Mr. Lane, who charges about this city with the unabashed power of a bulldozer, is a bald, chunky banker who knows what he's talking about. He serves as President of the Citizens & Southern National Bank, the biggest bank in Georgia.

He is a third-generation Georgia banker who was graduated from Yale in 1934. He owns 50 vintage automobiles and he wears a tie bearing the slogan, "It's a wonderful world."

But setting aside a flair for the unusual, Mr. Mills and other Atlanta executives are deadly serious about the role of this city, the home of Coca-Cola and "Gone With the Wind," in the business world.

When they talk about Atlanta, some local businessmen refer to it as "Mecca." It has the reputation of a congenial place to live, and one pretty research analyst who came South to conduct a company study for her Wall Street firm went home to report, "It's the friendliest city I've ever, ever seen."

Today Atlanta is scrambling to become "a national city."

In typically aggressive fashion, the city is building an $18-million sports stadium in an effort to obtain the baseball franchise of the Milwaukee Braves.

This move has set the beer homeland to foaming, but Atlanta's leading citizens are confident of their ultimate triumph.

"Just think!" exclaims an advertising man. "The world series in Atlanta!"

An equally impressive building was constructed much earlier here at more modest expense. This is the state capitol, completed in 1889 at a cost of $1 million and modeled after the capitol in Washington.

Today the spirit of business is the spirit that moves Atlanta and the tell-tale sounds abound.

For one thing, a surprising number of business leaders drink martinis instead of bourbon. One political figure is partial to a Scotch mist with a twist of lemon peel at lunch time.

But Coca-Cola is still known locally as "Georgia champagne" and some people in Atlanta drink it for breakfast.

It is significant that the man now serving his first term as mayor—Ivan Allen Jr.—has a business background in running a family-owned office supply company.

Atlanta has been fortunate over the last three decades in the leadership provided by its bankers who are friendly to business. The First National Bank, second largest in the city, is preparing to put up a 41-story skyscraper. It will add luster to Atlanta's growing skyline and loom as the tallest building in the southeast.

The Trust Company of Georgia, sometimes known as "the Coca-Cola Bank," also has played an active role in the city's rapid growth. Thanks to these and other banks, as well as a complex of insurance and financial institutions, Atlanta regards itself as "the Wall Street of the South."

And Other Things

One businessman paid the ultimate compliment to Charlotte, N.C. by describing it as "a little Atlanta."

But when you bite below the skin of the peach, there are other things to be found. Some informed persons, for example, will acknowledge the deep-rooted rivalry between Atlanta and the small towns and rural areas of Georgia. "There is a tremendous jealousy here," declares one leading citizen. "The plain fact is that Atlanta has got to quit looking down its nose at the rest of the state if all of Georgia is going to prosper."

This rivalry is basically both economic and political. For decades, Atlanta has been the shopping Mecca for well-heeled Georgians and the most promising youngsters have left such places as Americus, the seat of Sumter County, for the big city of Atlanta.

The political rift stems from Georgia's county unit system, which, until recently outlawed, meant that the rural parts of the state could dominate Atlanta despite the vast gap in population.

Finally, Atlanta today is the most liberal city in the Southeast in its attitude toward the Negro. The basis for Atlanta's behavior reflects the hard-headed awareness of its business community. But this comparatively liberal attitude for the South has served only to whet the animosity of much of rural Georgia toward Atlanta.

Just what did Atlanta have at the start?

First, it had location. This brought the first railroad crossing here in the mid-19th century and transportation has been booming ever since.

Second, it had as one leader frankly puts it, "no bugs." This meant that its altitude kept the town free from yellow fever dangers.

What has Atlanta go at the present time? The local Chamber of Commerce unblushingly begins its description as follows: "Atlanta, the capital of Georgia, is the commercial, industrial and financial dynamo of the Southeast."

A Chamber of Commerce, of course, tends to emphasize the good points of any given area while omitting the fact that, say, a city is built on the lip of a smouldering volcano.

But the key to the Chamber of Commerce in Atlanta is its domination by the city's most aggressive business leaders.

One brokerage office manager who has worked in the East describes his schedule as follows:

An 11-Hour Day

"My friends in New York City think it just great that I can drive from home to the office in 20 minutes. What they don't realize, however, is that I'm apt to get into town at 6:30 A.M. for some civic committee meeting and then go to another meeting for breakfast. At night I usually attend a fundraising meeting or another session of some kind before I drive home. Portal to portal, it's an 11-hour day."

Atlanta-based companies range from Scripto, makers of ballpoint pens, to Rich's, a department store that is approximately Nieman-Marcus, Macy's and Lord & Taylor all rolled into one. There is also Oxford Manufacturing, Atlantic Steel, and the Southern Company.

There is manufacturing done in Atlanta, but this is characteristically a city that puts together parts rather than producing parts. The assembly plants of General Motors and Ford serve as examples.

But Atlanta has gained a mix in its economy that is lacking, for example, in a city such as Birmingham, which is so heavily dependent upon its iron and steel complex.

One 9-year-old boy who grew up in New England until the second grade sums up his main reaction to Atlanta as follows: "It's got space."

A Government economist takes a somewhat more sophisticated view. "The economics of conglomeration are at work here," he explained. "The fact that Atlanta is already a center for regional offices will attract similar offices from other companies."

A Rockefeller Plan for Arkansas

Winthrop Has Hope for Industry Gains in Adopted State

11-23-64

By VARTANIG G. VARTAN

Special to The New York Times

LITTLE ROCK—"If there's any industry I can bring to Arkansas, I'll be glad to do so."

This comment came recently from Winthrop Rockefeller, who in recent years has done more to attract out-of-state companies to Arkansas, where he has lived for the last decade, than any single man.

The main channel for his leadership was the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission (known locally as the A. I. D. C.), created by the Legislature to bring new industry to the Land of Opportunity, as it is called, and to encourage the expansion of existing plants.

Today, the A. I. D. C., minus the Rockefeller leadership, stands at a crossroads. Its advocates hope that the commission has gained enough momentum since its organization in 1955 to keep it running effectively.

Earlier this month, Mr. Rockefeller lost a bitterly-fought campaign for the Governorship to the Democrat incumbent, Orval E. Faubus, who was elected to his sixth straight term in a job that pays $10,000 a year.

Mr. Rockefeller, who threw his straw-colored cowboy hat into the ring on April 4, only three days after he resigned as A. I. D. C. chairman, intends to run for Governor again on the Republican ticket in 1966.

Winthrop Rockefeller

He makes it clear that he is committed to the progress and prosperity of Arkansas, his adopted state.

"On the other hand," he said in an interview, "I feel no great debt to Mr. Faubus or the A. I. D. C."

Mr. Rockefeller is a compelling figure. He stands 6 feet 5 inches in cowboy boots ("I haven't worn regular shoes for years," he says) and in a fast-striding campaign he ran a surprisingly good race, often gobbling his favorite snack of peanut-butter sandwiches on the run.

Development Group Faces Crossroads in Its Program

This race, in a sense, struck a chord common to the entire South where people are talking more and more about such things as "economic acceleration."

Part of this acceleration can come from within any given state, but a lot of the speed-up depends upon attracting new industry. As a result, Southern states are scrambling against each other as they scout the East and other corporate empires.

As inducements, Southern states offer a varying mix of low construction costs, tax benefits, water supply, abundant labor, plant-financing plans and even such heart-warming appeals to executives as "drive home for lunch with the family."

For a number of years, however, Arkansas enjoyed a distinction that no other plant-hunting state could claim. This was Winthrop Rockefeller, now 52, the next-to-youngest of the five Rockefeller brothers and the grandson of a man whose income amounted to $30 million a year before the era of the Federal income tax.

was starting his first term, he appointed Mr. Rockefeller to the newly organized A. I. D. C. and the other six members promptly picked him as chairman. It was an obvious choice and just about everybody in Arkansas appeared delighted.

Two years later, Governor Faubus was to sign a legislative resolution commending Mr. Rockefeller for his leadership at the A. I. D. C. But by last year, months before the formal resignation, a break between the two men was clearly in the offing.

Political pressures were being exerted by this time and Mr. Rockefeller says that he would have resigned even if he did not run for Governor. "The role of the A. I. D. C is to bring industry to the state and not benefit any specific community," he said.

His opening statement as a gubernatorial candidate criticized what he called the long domination of "a one-party government."

He Gets the Credit

Local business leaders give Mr. Rockefeller credit for his accomplishments. "The Rockefeller name had great pulling power among business executives," one banker observed. "It opened a lot of doors."

But there was some grumbling about the professional talent brought into Arkansas in top A. I. D. C. posts. Ultimately, this widened the rift between Messrs. Rockefeller and Faubus.

When he stepped down as commission chairman after serving more than eight years, Mr. Rockefeller could point to the following record compiled with the guidance of the A. I. D. C.:

¶The creation of some 90,000 new jobs in the state.

¶An annual payroll amounting to around $270 million as a result of these additional jobs.

¶More than 600 new plants scattered throughout Arkansas in a deliberate effort to bring industry to all parts of the state.

¶The expenditure of an estimated $100 million in capital construction.

A Magic Password

It is true that a great deal along these lines would have been accomplished under any able chairman. But the Rockefeller name proved a magic password in permitting Arkansas plant hunters to tell their story to out-of-state executives.

And when the plant hunters came to New York City, Mr. Rockefeller instructed them to stay at the St. Regis Hotel on the simple theory such an address would induce more return telephone calls from New York executives than a commercial hotel. The technique worked excellently.

New industry is important to any Southern state, but it held a special significance for Arkansas. Still fresh in the minds of local citizens is the fact that for five years after the Little Rock High School in 1957 not a single new plant came to this capital city.

A movie marquee last month put the slogan, "Little Rock Loves Industry," in lights below a Doris Day film.

Plants Listed

As for the state generally, its new plants in recent years include the Daisy Manufacturing Company (maker of air guns) at Rogers, Seiberling Rubber Company at Batesville, American Greeting Corporation at Osceola, and the Norge division of Borg-Warner at Fort Smith.

Named as Mr. Rockefeller's successor to head the A. I. D. C. was C. Hamilton Moses, the highly respected, retired chairman of the Arkansas Power & Light Co. But Mr. Moses, who is 77, is regarded as an interim appointment. He is a law partner of Senator John L. McClellan.

South's income goes up

Wages and salaries paid to workers in commerce, industry, government and the professions in the Southern states in 1963 amounted to $49,250,000,000 or 66 per cent of a total of $74,-360,000,000 received in personal income. The remainder was made up of proprietors' income, property income, transfer payments and other labor income. Gains of 6.7 per cent in wages and salaries received and 5.9 per cent in total personal income were recorded in 1963 over 1962, according to the Atlanta field office of the U.S. Department of Commerce.

Announcing results of a study of data compiled by the Commerce Department's Office of Business Economics in Washington on sources of income in 1963, the Atlanta office said the income in wages and salaries in the 12 state area included $5,348,-000,000 paid to residents of Georgia, $7,199,000,000 in Florida, $3,745,000,000 in Alabama, $1,-858,000,000 in Mississippi, $3,-982,000,0000 in Louisiana, $1,-744,000,000 in Arkansas, $6,620,-000,000 in Virginia, $2,242,000,-000 in West Virginia, $3,547,000,-000 in Kentucky, $4,454,000,000 in Tennessee, $5,753,000,000 in North Carolina and $2,758,000,-000 in South Carolina.

Daniel M. Paul, director of the Atlanta field office, said that 52 per cent of all persoanl income received by residents of the southern states last year came from wages and salaries paid in manufacturing plants, by government agencies (including federal, state and local governments and the military forces), and to persons engaged in wholesaling, retailing and the service trades, including professional services. He said 78 per cent of all wages and salaries paid to workers also came from manufacturing, government activity, retailing, wholesaling and the service trades.

In the field of manufacturing in the region, wages and salaries increased 6.6 per cent in 1963 over 1962; in government service, 7.0 per cent; wholesale and retail trade, 6.4 per cent; finance, insurance and real estate, 7.5 per cent; transportation, 4.5 per cent; communications and public utilities, 4.5 per cent; and the service trades, 7.8 per cent.

In addition to income received in the form of wages and salaries, proprietors' income (including both farm and nonfarm rose from $9,358,000,000 in 1962 to $9,816,000,000 in 1963 for an increase of 4.9 per cent and property income went from $8,163,-000,000 to $8,806,000,000 for an inrcease of 7.9 per cent.

Florida led the 12 Southern states in total personal income in 1963 with $11.9 billion followed by Virginia with $8.9; North Carolina, $8.6; Georgia, $7.7; Tennessee, $6.5; Louisiana, $6 billion; Kentucky and Alabama, $5.5; South Carolina, $3.9; West Virginia, $3.3; Mississippi, $3.1; and Arkansas, $2.9 billion.

In percentage gain in total personal income in 1963 over 1962, Mississippi was at the top with an increase of 9.5 per cent followed by Georgia with an 8 per cent rise. Arkansas was in third place with a gain of 7.3 per cent, Alabama fourth with 7.2 per cent, Louisiana fifth with 6.7 per cent, Tennessee sixth with 6.5 per cent, and Florida seventh with an increase of 6.4 per cent. Following in order were Virginia, 6.1 per cent; South Carolina, 5.3 per cent; North Carolina, 5.2 per cent; Kentucky, 5.0 per cent; and West Virginia, 3.9 per cent.

These figures were compiled from the August, 1964, issue of Survey of Current Business, official monthly publication of the Office of Business Economics. Copies are available at the Atlanta field office of the U.S. Department of Commerce, 400 Home Savings Bldg., 75 Forsyth St., N.W., Atlanta.

Federal Money In Mississippi

Mississippi's dolorous Democrats, alienated from party loyalty for more than a decade, have met and agreed to permit the name of Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey to appear on the ballot. They consented to the Democratic label only after Governor Johnson had spoken for Mr. Goldwater's election and said the plan would make it easier to defeat the Democratic ticket in Mississippi. Angry, and seemingly in vindictive mood, they displayed hostile banners and pledged to vote GOP.

In 1948 the Mississippi Democrats walked out to support South Carolina's Strom Thurmond, hero of the Dixiecrat party. In 1960 they cast their electoral votes for Virginia's Senator Byrd.

Nowhere in the South has there been more consistent criticism of "federal expenditures" than in Mississippi. Each year a state business group, also hostile to "Washington," issues a statement giving Mississippi's federal tax payments—but failing to print the total of federal expenditures in the state. Newspapers in the capital city, and elsewhere, carefully nurse this misrepresentation.

Various Stages

The Southern states are in various stages of development from the underdeveloped status that is the fate of every region or country that has long depended on an agricultural economy. All profit more from federal spending than do other states.

But Mississippi is the best cared for of all. No other state has so massive a stake in federal spending. If Washington were to "save" as a reaction to the constant Mississippi critiexpenditures in the state. Newspapers in the capital city, and elsewhere, carefully nurse this misrepresentation.

Various Stages

The Southern states are in various stages of development from the underdeveloped status that is the fate of every region or country that has long depended on an agricultural economy. All profit more from federal spending than do other states.

But Mississippi is the best cared for of all. No other state has so massive a stake in federal spending. If Washington were to "save" as a reaction to the constant Mississippi criticism of "government spending" and cut off aid from the federal government, the result would be disaster for the Magnolia State.

Mississippi's taxpayers furnish the smallest share of federal expenditures. In 1962 federal tax collections in Mississippi were $270,793,000, of which $219,380,000 was income tax. But during the year 1962 federal expenditures in the state amounted to $644,617,217. This meant that for every $3 paid in federal taxes the federal government spent $6.50 in support of the economy of Mississippi.

Yet, there goes on in Mississippi, day in and day out, a continual attack on undefined federal spending, federal waste, federal extravagance. The fact is that federal spending is the major support of the state's economy.

It might be well, for a year, to respond to the demands of Mississippi's politicians and public voices for reduction of spending to save more than $600 million by simply withholding the federal spending from the state. That, of course, is not what they want. They want to have it both ways—to damn the federal government as a spender and yet draw heavily on federal funds to keep their economy going.

Price Supports

Mississippi fervently supports, as do other cotton states, the generous price support loans on cotton. But only in Mississippi are efforts by Democrats and Republicans to reduce these loans attacked by congressmen and newspapers as the efforts of "left-wing Democrats." (They do not seem to have noticed that Senator Goldwater is pledged to end price supports.) The fact that Senator Harry Byrd once led such an attempt apparently escaped them. Mississippi's economy also receives enormous boosts from capital that comes into the state for flood control and soil conservation work. This is not regarded as "socialistic."

No region has so much to gain from existing federal policies and the natural resources development acts now proposed as "the South"—and the old cotton states in particular.

Mississippi merely illustrates how many Southerners are willing to handicap themselves, their state, and their children by an overriding obsession with race.

SOUTHEAST GAIN SETS NEW MARKS

Business Confident as Area Again Outpaces Nation

By JIM MONTGOMERY
Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA—The economy of the Southeast, spurred by a capital spending boom and a vigorous recovery in its cotton textile industry, outpaced the nation again in 1964.

And the region's business and political leaders alike are confident that 1965 will bring a repeat performance.

Few subscribe to the view that the second half of this year will see a diminution of growth rates across the nation.

Nor is enthusiasm dampened by the awareness that racial problems may erupt again. Despite outbreaks of racial violence in 1964, few disruptive repercussions could be found in the region's economy.

Of far greater concern to executives here are such potential national perils as inflation and Great Britain's monetary crisis.

Another concern is White House attention to selective steel price increases.

Late last year, the Citizens & Southern National Bank — the largest in Georgia and second largest in the South—tried to initiate a nationwide increase in the prime rate and ran into White House opposition.

Mills B. Lane Jr., the bank's president, yielded wryly:

"Three weeks ago, I saw nothing but optimism [regarding the nation's economic outlook]. Now I'm confused. When the Federal Reserve chairman and the President say a change of one-quarter of one per cent in the prime rate could endanger the economy, we must be in a very delicate balance."

Meanwhile, most businesses and states in the Southeast are reporting robust growth, current and prospective, with spending leading the way.

Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, asserting that his state's economic growth rate in 1964 was twice that of the nation's, said industrial capital spending there for the first nine months had surged to $247.5 million last year from $184.7 million in 1963.

South Carolina announced that investments in new and expanded industry edged up to $267 million last year from the previous high of $264 million in 1963.

The Georgia State Chamber of Commerce said capital outlays for new and expanded plants more than doubled during 1964, reaching nearly $208 million compared with little more than $85 million in 1963 and the former record of $156 million in 1958.

Alabama reported $666 million of industrial capital spending for the last two years, exceeding the total for the four preceding years. Included, last year alone, were several large new paper, chemical and textile plants, and major steel mill expansions.

Reliable estimates indicate that nearly all other states in the region must have shared in the gains and will record still more in 1965.

Adding a major contribution to this year's economic growth, especially in the Carolinas and Georgia, will be the long-dormant textile industry, which was reinvigorated last April by Congressional passage of the one-price cotton bill.

Mill operators look and sound truly happy for the first time since the Korean War. The industry's prospects and plans are indicated by a recent poll showing that 35 representative cotton mills in Georgia have scheduled capital additions totaling $30 million for 1965 as compared with $24 million last year.

And employment in the industry has been advancing steadily for months to the highest level in some five years.

As for economic growth generally, the Southeast is maintaining a more rapid growth rate than the nation as a whole by almost any measure one could choose.

Personal income is among the most widely compared.

Final 1964 figures are not yet in, but according to the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank the region's seasonally adjusted annual rate of total personal income for the first 10 months was up 6.9 per cent, while the nation's was up 5.9 per cent.

Over-all economic trends in the area persist much in the pattern of the last 10 years or so, with a continuing shift of population to the cities and little or no new economic development in the rural areas.

In farming, the last two years are described as exceptionally good ones.

Looking ahead, executives of major retail stores and chains serving the Southeast say they are budgeting for first-half sales increases of some 5 per cent.

But many are keeping their fingers crossed as the April 15 income tax deadline approaches.

Top officials of food, furniture and department stores say they are cautious because of possible impact of spring business of consumers having to pay unexpectedly large tax settlements.

TEXAS IS HITCHING WAGON TO SPACE

Oil Industry Falters Under Impact of Imports

By CARL FREUND
Special to The New York Times

DALLAS—The dawn of a new era of discovery and exploration is changing the face of Texas.

King Cotton, long the ruler of the Texas economy, was forced to abdicate by oil. Now —though it remains an important factor—oil finds its dominant position threatened by industries associated with the Space Age.

The home of the multimillion-dollar manned space center of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Houston can boast that it is "the space capital of the nation."

Engineers at the Texas Instruments plant near Dallas design delicate equipment to receive and analyze data transmitted by missiles hurtling through space.

Workers in the windowless General Dynamics plant on the west edge of Fort Worth are building the supersonic TFX fighter-bomber—also known as the F-111—under a contract that became an issue in the Presidential campaign.

Gov. John Connally and other state officials envision Texas as the western anchor of an aerospace industrial and research complex that will curve around the Gulf Coast to the Cape Kennedy area.

Foreign imports have crippled the Texas oil industry. The effect has been especially great in such cities as Midland, Odessa, Big Spring and Wichita Falls, which depend heavily on oil production and exploration. Newspapers carry notices each week of bankruptcy sales as drilling and servicing concerns go out of business.

However, most business leaders were optimistic as 1965 began. They predicted more and more industry would come to Texas.

"We have found ourselves caught up in an industrial and technological revolution which affects every aspect of our lives," Governor Connally said at a Dallas conference sponsored by the Texas Manufacturers Association. "Last year we ranked second only to New York in the number of new plant locations. It had 325 to our 317."

Chambers of Commerce in metropolitan cities and small hamlets try unceasingly to attract industry, and many have been successful.

The Eastman Kodak plant at Longview and a heavy-equipment manufacturing plant there helped cushion the impact of oil imports. Budweiser is building a brewery in Houston and Schlitz has announced plans for one in East Texas. The Carling plant in Fort Worth bottled its first beer late this year. The first soup cans came off the production line of a Campbell's plant in the northeast Texas city of Paris. And Dresser Industries of Dallas opened a $1 million sand-stripping plant near the Kosse community in east-central Texas.

The Dresser plant employs 350 persons. This isn't many, but the effect on the economy can be seen by checking 1960 census figures.

The figures show the average annual family income in Kosse was only $2,597.

Statistics compiled by the Texas Industrial Commission showed land was selected for 251 new manufacturing plants in the 12-month period ended Oct. 31. In this period, the commission said, 369 existing plants announced expansion programs.

An October study showed only 3.2 per cent of the Dallas labor force was unemployed.

The past year saw a boom in the construction of apartment buildings in cities. This has tapered off somewhat in Dallas, where many apartments are vacant, but is still going strong in Fort Worth.

Tarrant County voters approved a bond issue to finance a convention center in a run-down section of downtown Fort Worth. The approval came only after officials had emphasized that urban renewal was not involved.

Refineries and chemical plants are operating around the clock in the Houston area. Some carpenters there work beneath floodlights at night to keep pace with the demand for houses.

With new uses being found for plastics and chemicals turned out by the plants, the future is as bright as the flares seen near the refineries.

Still, bankers and economists agree there are some blemishes on the bright picture.

Many Texas families, especially those in which breadwinners lack high school educations, still have substandard incomes. There are still tenant farmers trying to scratch out a living in the sandy soil of East Texas. And some cities—Fort Worth and San Antonio are examples—still depend heavily on military and defense spending.

Columbus Celebrates the New Inland Port

By JACK SPALDING

ON FRIDAY the port of Columbus will be reopened. The event will be properly celebrated. There will be reaction throughout the Chattahoochee Valley, for we are a mobile and an interlocking society.

Reliable navigation to Columbus will bring new industries to that stretch of the river. There are industries which demand water transportation and now they will find Columbus and the lower valley more to their liking.

This should remind Atlanta that this city will be a lot better off when navigation is brought this far upstream.

The Atlanta project was declared feasible from an engineering point of view nearly 100 years ago. The problem now is to have it endorsed as economically feasible.

Surveys have suggested that bringing barges to Atlanta should be economic by the year 2000.

Well-informed and properly patriotic Atlantans think this errs on the conservative side. Atlanta consistently confounds its prophets. The city grows faster than it is supposed to grow.

The current argument against bringing barges up to Bolton is that there is not enough demand for water transportation to justify the cost of the project.

The answer of all proper Atlantans is bring up your barges. We'll fill them then with the products of new industries attracted by navigable waterways. Furthermore there are other plus factors in our favor such as recreation.

The rededication of the port of Columbus shows how this can be done. The remaking of the Apalachicola and Chattahoochee from the Gulf to Columbus was not just a matter of a survey.

REBORN

It took organization. It took years of work. It took the help of politicians. It had to be backed by the people of the area.

In Columbus they had all that. They had something else, the fervor of one man. He was the late Jim Woodruff Sr., and he made the river and the reopening of the port of Columbus his charge.

He lived to see the project far enough along to guarantee its completion. His son and namesake took up where he left off. On Friday this splendid concept of the Woodruffs, father and son, will be celebrated.

Columbus was a port at the beginning. In 1828 when the city was founded, steamers brought goods and settlers. The river there was clear and deep before the hills were planted to cotton.

Columbus remained something of a port up to the beginnings of World War II, though railroads, and the silting up of the channel ended the golden age of steamboating around the turn of the century.

Before then there was passenger and freight service to Apalachicola with connections to other Gulf points. The river carried supplies to the plantations along the valley and cotton was brought to the mills in Columbus or taken to Apalachicola for export.

Now the port of Columbus is back in business, thanks to the drive and energy of its people and the leadership of the Woodruffs.

Three dams below the city made it possible. The big Buford dam above Atlanta helped.

WHAT NEXT?

The three downstream dams plus some dredging brought Columbus a nine-foot channel. Buford dam helps regulate the flow of the stream.

Plans are in the making for another giant of a dam in the West Point area. This will help control stream flow at Columbus.

It also brings the barges that much closer to Atlanta.

The river now is navigable from Columbus to the Gulf.

The building of the West Point dam will leave two stretches of the river to be improved.

One is the relatively simple stretch above the West Point pool.

The other is the difficult, but not impossible Fall Line between Columbus and West Point. Here the river drops from the Piedmont plateau to the Coastal Plain. Here are a series of power dams which must be radically altered.

Can it be done? Sure. How? In the same fashion and manner in which it was done in Columbus, through leadership, organization and help from the people who represent us in Washington.

FARMERS FACING A DIFFICULT TIME

1964 Net Income Expected to Sink to Postwar Low

By J. H. CARMICAL

The nation's farmers may be facing a difficult period.

Prices of farm products are at the lowest level in nine years and yields are generally smaller than last year. As a result, net farm income for 1964 is expected to drop to the lowest level since World War II.

The increased prices that farmers have had to pay for goods and services in the production of crops this year have further added to their difficulties. Further, farmers in many areas have been plagued by unfavorable weather.

Despite an increase in Government payments, which this year are expected to top the $1.7 billion of 1963 by about 25 per cent, total net income of the nation's farmers may fall slightly below $12 billion. This would compare with $12.5 billion last year, $12.6 billion in 1962 and the postwar high of $17.3 billion in 1947.

Based on the monthly report of the Agriculture Department, the nation's farmers in mid-August were receiving 4 per cent less for their crops and livestock than a year earlier. The department's index in mid-August stood at 232 per cent of the 1910-14 average, the lowest for mid-August since

Crop Is Larger

This year's wheat crop is somewhat larger than the 1963 crop, but the carryover from previous crops of 900 million bushels on July 1 was about one-fourth lower than the 1,195,000,000 on July 1, 1963. The 1964 crop is placed at 1,289,982,000 bushels, compared with 1,137,641,000 in 1963.

Domestic consumption of wheat and exports for this season are expected to be slightly more than the yield from the crop. Because of a moderate increase in the use of wheat for feed, domestic consumption is predicted at 625 million bushels. Exports are estimated by the Department of Agriculture at 675 million bushels. This would be substantially below the 860 million bushels exported last season, but would be in line with that of other recent years.

Wheat exports got off to good start in the new crop year. From July 1 through Aug. 31, shipments exceeded 100 million bushels, or some 2.5 million mo than a year earlier. Big cash sales to Japan and large food-for-peace shipments abroad, mainly to India, helped increase the figure.

This year's wheat crop is being marketed under substantially different conditions than in any recent year. The price support rate has dropped to $1.30 a bushel, which is low enough to make wheat competitive with corn and other grains for livestock feed. Farmers cooperating with the Government are eligible for loans only at that low level.

Export Certificates

The cooperating wheat grower, however, gets domestic marketing certificates worth 70 cents a bushel on 45 per cent of normal production. The money to pay these certificates is raised through an assessment of 70 cents a bushel on wheat used by domestic mills. This assessment, called a processing tax by some, has resulted in some instances in an increase in the price of bread despite the lower marketing price for wheat.

In addition, the cooperating grower gets export certificates with a value of 25 cents a bushel on 45 per cent of normal production. Further, this year's pro-1955 and down from 242 per cent a year earlier.

If there had been a corresponding decline in prices farmers pay for goods and services, the situation would not be so troublesome. However, the index of these prices increased to 313 per cent of the 1910-14 average, up from 312 a year earlier. Increases in interest rates and taxes accounted for a large part of the rise.

Prices of farm products usually drop in the fall as harvesting steps up. If this is the case this year, the decline will start from the lowest point at this season in nine years. This would be in contrast to the recent trend in most non-farm commodities. Prices of such items, including copper, tin, lead and other metal have been advancing.

Although prices of some minor crops are holding rather firm, there have been sharp declines for major crops and for hogs and beef cattle, the two most important sources of income for the livestock branch.

Prices Off Despite Boom

In a period in which a busines boom has been in full swing, prices that farmers receive for wheat, corn and cotton production have dropped sharply.

The Department of Agriculture estimated that in mid-August growers were receiving $1.33 bushel for wheat, down from $1.77 a year earlier, and $1.12 a bushel for corn, down from $1.19. Cotton farmers were receiving 30.57 cents a pound, down from 32.04 cents a year earlier. Hogs where sown to 15.6 cents a pound from 16.7 cents and beef cattle to 18.3 cents from 20.4 cents.

With output of most farm crops this year below that of 1963, a stronger market normally would have been expected. However, the lowering of support prices for some crops and prospects for a slight decline in exports have tended to keep prices weak. Livestock prices have been influenced by large supplies from domestic sources and high beef imports, particularly from Australia.

This year's corn crop, which has been plagued by drought and disease, promises to be the smallest in several years. The Department of Agriculture has estimated the crop as of Sept. 1, at 3,640,267,000 bushels. This is 441,733,000 bushels below the record of 4,082,000,000 harvested in 1963.

This year's corn crop will be below requirements, but there will be a surplus on Oct. 1, the start of the corn year, of more than 1.5 billion bushels from prior crops. This carryover will take care of any defirienry that may develop. Since the depressed livestock prices may result in a sharp cut in cattle feeding, the deficit may not prove to be so great as many in the trade expect. Virtually all the surplus corn is owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Government's price-support agency.

gram called for a land-diversion payment that has averaged about $6 an acre.

Though these various payments by the Government, the cooperating wheat grower this year will get almost as much from his crop as he did in 1963.

For next year's crop, the cooperating wheat farmer will get a support rate of $1.25 a bushel, or 5 cents less than this year, but he will get domestic marketing certificates worth 75 cents, or 5 cents more than this year's on 45 per cent of normal production. Export certificates worth 30 cents will be available, but on 35 per cent of normal production instead of 45 per cent. There will be no land-diversion payments. The net result will be that a grower will get about 6.5 cents a bushel less than in 1964.

This year's cotton crop is a bit smaller than that of 1963, but producers will get less per pound for it because of the lower support rate. The crop, estimated as of Sept. 1 at 14,945,000 bales, would compare with the 1963 yield of 15,300,000 bales.

The carryover of cotton on Aug. 1, in the United States amounted to 12,400,000 bales. Thus, the total supply—carryover plus production —for this crop year will be 27,345,000 bales, the highest for any season since 1956-57.

Small Addition Possible

Domestic consumption and exports for this season are estimated by the Department of Agriculture at 14.8 million bales. This estimate is considered a bit high in the trade, but even if it should materialize there would be a small addition to stocks, already excessive, on Aug. 1, 1965.

Like wheat, this year's cotton crop is being produced on a different basis. The support rate is 30 cents a pound, or 2.47 cents less than in 1963. Farmers with allotments of 15 acres or less and those willing to reduce plantings to domestic needs will get a bonus of 3½ cents a pound on normal production.

Under the new act passed last spring, the two-price system for cotton, which previously made the fiber cheaper for export, was eliminated. In effect, the subsidy, which had previously applied to cotton sold for export, was extended to that consumed by domestic mills. The subsidy rate for this season, which started Aug. 1, has been set at 6½ cents a pound.

As a result of the changes, the domestic cotton textile industry will be able to get its cotton some 9 cents a pound cheaper than under the old program. Many, including the Agriculture Department, believe this will greatly stimulate domestic consumption.

Indications are that there will be another gain in foreign production of cotton this crop year. Despite the rising trend in consumption abroad, keener competition for United States cotton is expected in the international market.

Southern Hospitality Blends With Stocks

Informality Marks Security Dealings in the South

By VARTANIG G. VARTAN

Special to The New York Times

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.—"Well, man, where you been? How are Louise and little Sandra Jean, now?"

Homely greetings like this are apt to ring inside brokerage offices in the South when a customer telephones his registered representative.

A survey of three Southern cities—Little Rock, Atlanta, and Jackson, Miss.—shows that the securities business there differs vastly from that of New York City.

"In the South," said one office manager, "the investor must primarily know his broker in person and have confidence in him."

Social Contact

The securities salesman in a Southern city is likely to see his customers outside of the brokerage office. They may go to the same church, belong to the same club or work on the same fund-raising campaign.

In Wall Street, many salesmen go for years without seeing a client in person. It is a matter of mutual convenience to restrict contact to the telephone.

A tapewatcher in a Little Rock office gave this greeting recently to a salesman: "Understand you tore your britches the other day playing golf."

Fred Schwab for The New York Times

"Understand you tore your britches playing golf."

Setting aside this air of friendliness and informality, the Southerner is a different breed of investor from his counterpart in the East.

"People here usually are not looking for in-and-out trades in the stock market," one broker observed. "They're more apt to buy for the long term. When you call them up, you've got to give them reasons for buying a stock, other than it's active on the tape or some advisory service has recommended it."

Other aspects of the brokerage world in the South include:

¶A traditional orientation toward bonds and fixed-income securities on the part of many customers.

¶An active interest in local stocks, especially bank and life-insurance issues.

¶A lack of female registered representatives, reflecting a natural reluctance in this area to doing business with women.

Two generations ago, the wealthy Southerner bought mortgages. Today, his grandson buys tax-exempt municipals.

So oriented is the rich man in the South toward the fixed-income concept that many of them buy listed corporate bonds in addition to municipals.

Brokers Often Meet Their Clients on a Social Basis

As a result, relatively fewer Southerners have reaped mammoth capital gains in the stock market in the last 15 years.

"But don't go feeling sorry for the monied man here," warns a broker in Jackson. "You've got to realize that there are more investment opportunities than the stock market. A man will put his money into land or timber or cattle or hustle up an oil deal in this part of the country."

A number of member firms of the New York Stock Exchange operate chalk boards in the South, a tell-tale sign that clients are less anxious to spot up-to-the-second changes in the price of a stock.

Southerners tend to be fundamentalists rather than technicians in the stock market. "It doesn't mean anything for my clients to know about a secondary reaction in a primary bull market," a salesman says.

Thanks to the interest in local issues, many small securities firms operate successfully in the South even though they are not members of the New York Stock Exchange.

Typically, these houses will

belong to the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., and often to the Midwest Stock Exchange also. They sell local stocks, municipal bonds and mutual funds. Banks and insurance companies in the area, as well as individual investors, give them business.

"We find that many of our new customers are people who first bought into local situations and then gradually worked into listed stocks," explains the office manager of a Big Board firm.

In Little Rock, the largest office of a Big Board house is run by Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc. It has nine registered representatives and each man is at his desk by 8:30 A.M., ready for the Wall Street opening.

After the market closes for the day, salesmen often go out to pay a personal visit to clients or prospects.

Two other Big Board firms—A. G. Edwards & Sons and Hornblower & Weeks — maintain offices in Little Rock.

Throughout the smaller cities and towns of the South, member firms may operate offices with one salesman and a secretary. The salesman keeps in touch with the market usually by a stock ticker or by a teletype message wire.

The closer a visitor gets to Atlanta, the more apt he is to hear about the by-passed opportunities of ancestors to invest in shares of the Coca-Cola Company.

One brown-eyed Southern belle sighed:

"Grand-daddy didn't buy the stock because he always claimed nobody would pay money for a soft drink."

In Jackson, there is a trend toward youth in brokerage offices. Many clients are men in their twenties and thirties who are more inclined o be venturesome in the market. The salesmen are younger men, too.

In some brokerage offices of the South, customers like to deal in commodity futures. "King Cotton" is dead, when compared with the old days. Wheat and soybeans are the present rulers.

In Little Rock, the local insurance issues include National Old Line Life, American Foundation Life, First Pyramid Life, and Southern Equitable Life.

Among the local bank stocks are the Worthen Bank and Trust Company, Union National Bank, and First National Bank.

There is considerable investor interest here in Arkansas Louisiana Gas, a company that provides natural gas to many Arkansas communities.

The 1962 census of shareowners conducted by the New York Stock Exchange showed a total of 61,000 stockholders in Mississippi. Jackson had 27 per cent of the state total.

The total for Arkansas was 58,000 with Little Rock accounting for 36 per cent. Georgia's shareowner population came to 170,000 and 52 per cent lived in metropolitan Atlanta.

New York City alone could point to 1,639,000 stockholders. But, of course, the South still has the friendliest salesmen.

What Will Loss of Base

By WILLIAM McCLURE
Atlanta Journal Business Editor

Take 6,235 jobs and a $27 million payroll out of a town and it's bound to leave an aching void.

Savannah is going to miss Hunter Air Force Base when it closes its doors in mid-1967. The cries of anguish coming from the coast bear testimony to the anticipated ache.

The base has kept 5,600 military people and 635 civilians busy, and the bulk of the $27 million they receive each year has found its way into the community's trade channels.

A look at the town's economy, however, would seem to indicate the wrench may not be as severe as it seemed at first.

This is not to underestimate Hunter's contribution to the Savannah economy over the past decade and a half. It has been considerable.

BUT SAVANNAH and Chatham County now comprise a community of 200,000 population, and an economy that has become more and more industrially diversified in recent years. Its port is being increasingly expanded, and increasingly used.

There is probably a solid basis for the statement of Jack Altman, president of the Savannah Chamber of Commerce, that the city that has survived wars and occupations and depressions since 1733 will survive this blow too.

"We're not going to fold up and die just because it (Hunter) is going," he said.

IT IS, of course, going to be hard to convince the small grocer or dry cleaning attendant whose business has been mostly military that closing the base isn't catastrophic.

For him it is. And many of these smaller, base-oriented retail establishments won't survive.

Real estate is another area of the local economy that will be hit.

Over 11,000 military people and dependents live off the base. They own approximately 600 homes and rent another 1,550.

This many empty houses will prove a drag on the city's real estate market for some time to come.

The Savannah - Chatham County school system is going to miss the $397,000 in "impact" money it now receives from the federal government to help it educate military children.

AND THE 635 civilian jobs that will go with the base will be missed.

But these 635 must be measured against a total Chatham County employment of 65,850 (the normal decline between mid-September and mid-October was almost as much—550—and nobody threw in the towel). Even the 5,600 military (who aren't included in the employment total, incidentally) doesn't represent a staggering percentage loss, and it will be tempered by 106 who will remain to man a radar installation.

The $5 to $6 million Hunter spends annually in the Savannah area for contractural services and supplies will go, and the firms doing a lot of Air Force business will feel it.

But here again this must be compared with an economy which last year generated total retail sales of $373,830,386, and which doubtless will go even higher for 1964.

AS FOR THE schools' impact money, the $397,000 loss will undoubtedly hurt, but it represents only slightly more than three per cent of the system's annual $11.25 million budget.

Real estate may prove to be the spot where the blow falls hardest. One of the city's major builders said houses for the military have been accounting for up to a third of the 100 houses he builds a year.

He has revised his 1965 projections, cutting them 40 per cent. He thinks it will be the end of 1966 before the city's real estate market gets back to anything like normal.

BUT EVEN the real estate people — both builders and renters—say it will be only the marginal operators who will be forced out of business. By and large, they figure on some tough months, but are retrenching and are confident the real estate market will eventually right itself.

There are factors which will tend to soften the blow of the base's leaving.

Principal among these is the fact that Hunter will be phased out gradually between now and June 30, 1967. The community will have a chance to make the necessary adjustments over the next two and a half years.

And the government has promised to help find jobs for civilian workers displaced.

THIS IS THE second stepdown for Hunter. From the base's peak of around 7,000 people in 1950 when there were two Strategic Air Command wings there, it dropped to 3,500 in 1962 when the present carrier wing came in.

There was considerable anxiety on the community's part that time too, but it found the loss wasn't as bad as expected. Retail sales dropped between five and six per cent.

AND NOW that the base is definitely going, community leaders are mobilizing to utilize the facilities for other purposes.

There are, for example, a brand new nine-hole golf course and a well-equipped hospital at the base which could prove an inducement to agencies of varying types.

And if city planners can locate several small but diversified industrial plants at the site, they could eventually prove a much stronger bulwark of the local economy than the air base ever was.

The Orange Santa Claus

Debbie Frankle reports from Chicago: During the boycott of a shopping area, James Orange donned a Sata Claus suit and, along with four other hefty Freedom fighters, gave candy to the children and told them not to go in the stores. I understand some children were reduced to tears when their mothers tried to take them shopping, insisting they couldn't go in the stores 'cause Santa told them not to. Or were they reduced to tears at the sight of James Orange in a Santa suit?

Marian Willingham of our Finance Office went shopping in Atlanta for an ebony baby doll. She located a whole row of these dolls on a store counter, lined directly behind all the white dolls. Before selecting a gift, Marian moved each ebony doll in front of the white ones.

'Tis More Blessed to Give

Late in November, the family of William Whitsett, SCLC print shop foreman, was faced with a difficult Christmas. A fire in their apartment destroyed all furniture, clothes and personal items in a bedroom and damaged some possessions in other rooms. Four of the seven Whitsett children were at home and were rescued by neighbors. "Whit" was visiting his wife in the hospital. After the fire, the SCLC clerical staff's Benevolence Club took up a collection and Frances Sims, Club chairman, presented a check for $130.50 to "Whit."

The Secret Code

"S-C-L-C-double-0-7." All over Atlanta, children are passing this secret code. They got it from our 007, Rev. B. J. Johnson at the annual SCLC staff Christmas party for underprivileged children on December 17th. Gifts, refreshments, and entertainment for the 138 children were supplied by friends of SCLC. The party was planned and supervised by Carole Hoover, Anne Durrah, Lillie Hunter, Frances Sims, Gloria Fraction and Dora McDonald. Rev. Abernathy spoke to the children and pointed out that it was the staff, not executives, who did all the work on the party. Then B.J. (Bond, James) disclosed the code.

JUNIUS GOES REPUBLICAN

Junius Griffin, Administrator and Director of Public Relations, analyzed the election results and, after 18 months with SCLC, joined the Minorities Division of the Republican National Committee on Jan. 4. "Griff" is at Washington, D.C., but he's going to keep in touch with the Movement.

On Dec. 28, a farewell party for Junius was hosted by Claudette and Wesley Mathews. Unfortunately, Junius was stranded by snow in New York, so the staff at the party had no choice but to drown their sorrows.

SUNSHINE'S GARDENS

Where the Movement goes, often goes our own Mr. Ben "Sunshine" Owens. And Sunshine has got to have his greens. So, he makes sure by planting gardens and growing corn, watermelons, greens, cucumbers, asparagus, and spinach. He's also becoming famous for sending peanuts and pecans to our leaders. Sunshine has worked for SCLC in many places, including Crisp County, Ga. and Sumter, Perry and Greene Counties Ala. Your greens are mighty tasty, Sunshine, but how about some moonshine too?

SCLC TRIUMPH!

The Chicago DEFENDER in a Dec. 28 editorial said that Government approval of SCLC's new housing project in Chicago "re-enforced public confidence" in Dr. King's leadership. The project will rehabilitate slum apartment buildings in three neighborhoods. The editorial praised our philosophy of constructive nonviolent programs and said: "Dr. King has reaffirmed the credo he has preached from the start of the stormy battles of the civil rights revolution."

MORE FAME FOR SCLC

We've been educating the country about Operation Breadbasket lately, and the press has been playing it up. Many Negro newspapers ran our full story, with pictures of Rev. Fred Bennette, National Director, and other Breadbasket leaders, JET had a big cover story and NEWSWEEK wrote a feature on the program. Our own Dave Wallace did a cover story in the Chicago Theological Seminary's magazine, REGISTER. Chicago businessmen who were helped by Breadbasket victories have been placing ads urging support for the program. P.S.: Thanks to Carol Griffin for helping N&S stay informed on Breadbasket in Chicago.

SCLC DEMANDS PROTECTION FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

Dr. Bob Green recently went to Camden, Ala., to investigate situations in the Wilcox County integrated schools. He found, in long interviews with Negro pupils, that a pattern of physical mistreatment and constant abuse existed ever since the schools were integrated last September. Bob reported this in detail to the U.S. Justice Department and on behalf of SCLC he demanded a court injunction on school officials requiring them to provide protection for the students. He also suggested that federal funds should be cut off if the harrassment continues.

HAPPY NEW YEAR!

At 12:01 AM on Jan. 1, 1967 some SCLC staffers sang "WE Shall Overcome." We hope you did, too. Let's make this the best year for SCLC.

MORE "QUIET WORK" OF SCLC

While major SCLC programs are making headlines, many smaller projects and movements related to SCLC are working effectively at the local level. For example:

SCLC's Roosevelt Barnett and the Montgomery Improvement Association recently won more than 180 new jobs for Negroes at stores in Montgomery. One store gave in after five weeks of picketing, and other businesses quickly fell in line after that.

George Rascoe, who works with Golden Frinks in Bertie County, N.C., Freedom Movement, was in Atlanta last month and reported on plans for a poor people's store and efforts to integrate Negro schools, now that white schools are integrated.

Mike Baum, Co-ordinator of the Greater Miami Chapter of SCLC, writes that this Affiliate is working with slum tenants to get improvements in housing. The Miami Movement keeps spirits up at mass rallies and demonstrations.

The Wilcox County SCLC is a sponsor of the new antipoverty program for seasonal farm workers, and SCLC is supplying staff for that project.

WHAT'S HAPPENING, BABY?

Do you know what's going on at some projects not mentioned in this issue of North and South?

We don't either, because we haven't heard from them. We can't make long distance calls to get the news. We depend on you to take a few minutes to write us. No news means no N&S. Please, please write: North and South, SCLC, 334 Auburn Avenue, N.E., Atlanta, Ga. 30312

C. E. P. NEWS

Annell Ponder of the Citizenship Education Program and Ben Mack, Field Secretary of South Carolina, went to Washington, D. C., Dec. 8-10 to represent SCLC at a conference on Negro history. About 3,000 educators, community leaders and nationally prominent Negroes met to discuss the problems of racism in education and the lack of accurate information for school children on the Negro's contributions to history.

The conference, sponsored by the American Federation of Teachers, heard of textbooks which contain glaring omissions and untruths about the role of Negroes in history. Participants agreed that a concerted new effort must be made to improve the teaching of Negro history. They also strongly criticized the use of the American language to convey favorable interpretations of "whiteness" and offensive interpretations of "blackness."

One popular idea at the conference was that the term "Afro-American" should replace the term "Negro," since black people have a rich African heritage.

Annell and Ben were expecially interested in getting ideas and information for C. E. P. adult education classes.

The next C. E. P. workshop will be Feb. 13-17 at the Dorchester Community Center in Liberty County, Georgia.

Some C. E. P. staff members went to Annemanie, Ala., in mid-December to help teach adults in the new SCLC-sponsored anti-poverty project in Wilcox County.

GRENADA: HARRASSMENT, CHRISTMAS VOLUNTEERS, A NEWSPAPER

Negro citizens of Grenada have encountered more physical harrassment. Pickets have had to dodge deliberately reckless drivers. Three girls reported a shot was fired at them when they passed the Shell Station on Commerce Street.

Abuse and beatings continued at the integrated schools. For example, a high school boy suffered a fractured skull. A girl was chased by two white men on her way home from school. SCLC has repeatedly demanded protection for the children from local, state and federal authorities.

Hundreds of UCLA students pitched in $2 each and sent 11 students to spend Christmas vacation in the Grenada project. They tutored classes and brought programs of art, drama and Negro history to Grenada.

Commenting on the successful Christmas Blackout of Grenada, Pete Lowenburg, UCLA spokesman for the volunteers, said, "This Blackout Christmas is the best holiday being celebrated in this country. Christ would know us and feel at home."

Bruce Hartford has organized a Poor Peoples Committee to study welfare laws, and after confrontation with the Welfare Department, Committee members won the right to accompany welfare applicants during all hearings.

The Grenada Movement is publishing a mimeographed paper, "The Grenada Weekly Advocate." It includes up-to-date Movement news, Movement history, sermonettes, child-care advice, social announcements, and editorials. Jim Bullock is editor.

MEMO: To our Friends

FROM: The SCLC Staff

SUBJECT: SCLC Project Report

SCHOOL INTEGRATION One of the most shameful untold stories in the South is the day-to-day physical abuse and constant harassment endured by Negro children and their parents in integrating schools. This year, SCLC is fighting for elementary physical protection of Negro school children in two particularly vicious school systems - Wilcox County, Alabama and Grenada, Mississippi, where white schools were integrated in September. Beatings of children in and out of the schools took place every day. Some Negro parents, unable to watch their children being subject to torment and physical harm, finally pulled them out of the schools. Recognizing that this could be a disastrous setback to school integration and conscious of the deep willingness to take risks, SCLC staff members rallied the Negro community and 168 Negro students returned to the integrated schools. One day, history will adequately record the heroism of these parents and children. At this writing, the abuse in both Grenada and Wilcox has subsided.

SELF-HELP PROJECTS Among the largest and incontestably the most successful Negro-owned cooperative in the South is the silk screen plant established in Talieferro, Ga. Established by SCLC and others to give work to Negroes fired because of their civil rights activity, it has expanded into garment manufacturing. It is operating profitably in competitive trade channels and is already the largest industry in the town.

In Grenada, Miss., work is almost completed on the Negro-owned and managed cooperative supermarket which grew out of the boycott campaigns against the discrimination in white stores.

The poverty program which SCLC staff designed and launched in Wilcox County, Alabama, has been so successful it has burst over its banks. Planned for 200 families, response has been so phenomenal the project is running triple sessions at ten educational centers for over 500 families. (Wilcox County Negroes, in the midst of America's historic boom, earn $540 per capita annually.)

SCLC's strong Charleston, S.C. affiliate has formed a credit union, registered 3,000 new voters, sponsored a day care center and embarked on a job finding program.

A group of Chicago Negro business men, inspired and led by Dr. King, have furnished $50,000 as working capital to start rehabilitation of slum buildings. The Negro businessmen will receive no profit; they were motivated to use some of their savings to help others get a start in livable housing.

POLITICAL ACTION Registration and political education are beginning to pay off. The turning point was, of course, the emergence of a civil rights movement and enactment of the Voting Rights bill in 1965, a direct outgrowth of our Selma movement.

To be sure, there were serious setbacks last November. The Wallace victory in Alabama and Maddox in Georgia are consequences of both backlash and the inexperience of the young Negro political movement. We must not fail to see that in the primaries, the real elections, each of the segregationists faced an opponent who was distinguished and who asked publicly for the Negro vote, attended their meetings and submitted to their examinations. This alone is historic in Southern politics. Not to have won the first time out is neither a disgrace nor disheartening. Negroes are registered in large numbers and their ranks are increasing. Democracy can be won in the South. Hard work carried us this far and it cannot fail to take us to a victorious finish.

It is not so well known that a rapidly growing Negro vote in the South influenced many elections in 1966. This development follows intensive registration campaigns in the last year, many directed by SCLC.

The Negro vote in Georgia now has statewide impact, thanks partly to an SCLC-backed registration effort. Even more significant for the long run was the pleasantly astonishing coalition of whites and Negroes that turned Georgia's political scene into pandemonium last fall. It was a coalition unofficially but definitely inspired and led by SCLC people acting as individuals. Here you had an unheard-of-alliance of liberals, Negroes and even "crackers" - poor whites. Without much money or manpower, their write-in movement prevented the election of the top two segregationist contenders until Maddox was rescued by the courts, which permitted the old county-unit crowd to name a governor.

In Arkansas, the moderate Rockefeller defeated a segregationist by 45,000 votes, and a Negro turnout of more then 80,000 went better than 90% to Rockefeller for governor.

Negro voters in South Carolina, according to the respected research of the Southern Regional Council, "plainly provided the margin for a U.S. Senator and probably for a Governor." The Negro vote of 100,000 was overwhelmingly for a Democrat elected to the Senate by 12,000 votes and another Democrat winning the governorship by 72,000 votes.

The longer view is that registration and political education must continue. In 11 Southern states, Negro registration rose from 1.5 million in 1962 to 2.7 million today. Our goal was a doubling of the registered voters and despite handicaps we have come close to full success. But only about half of voting-age Negroes are registered in the South, compared to 70% for white adults.

OPERATION BREADBASKET National attention and admiration came to this five-year-old department of SCLC recently when Breadbasket in Chicago negotiated unprecedented concessions from large grocery chains.

Operation Breadbasket, throughout the South and in Chicago, has gained thousands of positions for Negroes at hundreds of companies. The value in annual income is many millions. In Chicago alone, during the last eight months, Breadbasket produced 900 new jobs worth $6 million per year. More gains in this program, directed by biracial groups of ministers, are steadily chalked up in the South. Some recently won jobs in the South: supervisors and stenographers at a state hospital in Dinwiddie County, Va.; cashiers, sales clerks and a manager at retail stores in Tallahassee, Fla., salesmen at two car dealerships in Atlanta, driver-salesmen at an Atlanta dairy. Under the auspices of Breadbasket a union was organized and then recognized as bargaining agent at a plant in Anniston, Alabama.

CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION PROGRAM At carefully planned and regularly scheduled workshops, the professional CEP staff has trained more than 3,000 Southern adults, most of them illiterates. These adults have returned home to instruct tens of thousands more in basic reading and writing, citizenship duties, voting rights, community development, consumer knowledge, legal processes, welfare laws and government programs.

AFFILIATES SCLC affiliate chapters - churches, civic and civil rights groups - quietly conduct their own programs, with the cooperation and advice of the national staff. Some typical recent activities of Affiliates: The Montgomery Improvement Assn. obtained more than 180 new retail jobs. Negroes established their own department store in rural Virginia. The Petersburg, Virginia, Improvement Assn. arranged an increase in local Negro telephone operators from zero to ten and this affiliate also spearheaded the election of a second Negro to the city council. In Miami, the SCLC chapter is organizing slum tenants.

URBAN RENEWAL In Chicago we are taking direct action against an attempt to wipe out Negro homes to replace them with commercial operations. Instead of genuine community renewal, this type of Government "renewal" projects frequently mean the transfer of displaced ghetto families into already overcrowded slums. In Chicago's Englewood area, 600 basically sound, Negro-owned homes have been threatened with destruction, to make way for a shopping mall and parking lots! The Freedom Movement has protested the project by encouraging customers to stop buying in the business district.

ROOSEVELT SCOTT FEEDS THE STOVE

A Christmas Eve in Tent City-- 'It's Too Cold To Make a Cake'

BY VIOLA BRADFORD

TENT CITY--You don't have to live in a big brick house, fully decorated with Christmas lights or a fancy tree, in order to enjoy Christmas Eve.

Christmas Eve in a tent with no decorations--just the spirit of Christmas--can be just as much fun.

At least, it was for the Scott family, who spent their first Christmas Eve in Tent City last week. The Scotts and several other families were evicted from their old homes in Lowndes County after the adults registered to vote.

"I like it," said Roosevelt Scott, one of the four little boys who live in Tent City with their mother and father. "It's just like camping."

It is like camping, nearly every day of the year. But at this special time--Christmas Eve--it's also just like home. The things that made it seem like home were the cooking of the turkey and the Christmas tree put up by Roosevelt's brother, Odell.

Passing by on the highway, travelers couldn't see what went on in the tents this Christmas Eve.

But inside one of the tents, Mrs. Annie B. Scott and her husband sat watching a football game on their television set. Every once in a while, they would look into the pan at the turkey that was cooking, or add a piece of firewood to the stove. The turkey was sent to the Scotts for Thanksgiving. But it arrived too late, so they saved it for Christmas.

("We couldn't make any cakes this Christmas," said Mrs. Mandy Glover, a Tent City resident. "It's been too cold outside.")

Odell and Roosevelt Scott; a third brother, Cathy Lee; and their cousins, who were visiting them, played with some new toys inside another tent. "I wish I stayed out here," said one of the cousins, as he rolled a truck across the dirt floor.

A small Christmas tree sat on a table in the corner of the tent. "I made it," said Odell with a proud grin. "I did it at home."

The tree was a piece of pine sitting in a lard can filled with dirt. To decorate the tree, Odell had made pink, green, and red bulbs out of construction paper, and tied them to the leaves of the tree. A red ribbon made from a bologna wrapping held his Christmas tree in place.

Scattered on the ground outside the tents were toys that had been given to

Tuscaloosa Rights Group Gets OK for Head Start

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA -- Just a few weeks ago, Tuscaloosa was not going to have a Head Start program next summer, because no one was applying to run one. Then suddenly there were too many Head Start plans, as five groups scrambled to fill out two separate applications.

And surprisingly, an application naming a civil rights group to run Head Start won official approval--over an application naming the city board of education which ran the city's last Head Start program two years ago.

As the year drew to a close last week, the Tuscaloosa Opportunity Program (TOP)--the official anti-poverty agency--was rushing to meet a special extended deadline for work on the application filed by the civil rights group, the Tuscaloosa Citizens for Action Committee (TCAC).

When TOP and the board of education announced last November that they were not applying for Head Start, TCAC made use of its equipment, saying this was "against school policy."

Rogers also said the application filed by TCAC and the other three groups is better, because it is "more broadly based," and because its centers will be located in "fringe areas," where the classes are more likely to be integrated.

Last year, the school board's application for Head Start was rejected largely because it didn't call for enough faculty desegregation. Some parents say the city board didn't apply for Head Start in November because it was still unwilling to follow the federal desegregation guidelines. But Nelson said the board knew what it was getting into when it made its application in December.

And surprisingly, an application naming a civil rights group to run Head Start won official approval--over an application naming the city board of education which ran the city's last Head Start program two years ago.

As the year drew to a close last week, the Tuscaloosa Opportunity Program (TOP)--the official anti-poverty agency--was rushing to meet a special extended deadline for work on the application filed by the civil rights group, the Tuscaloosa Citizens for Action Committee (TCAC).

When TOP and the board of education announced last November that they were not applying for Head Start, TCAC made a massive last-minute effort to put together an application. The group made the effort even though TOP Executive Director Jerry Griffin said it was "too late" to prepare the forms for the Dec. 15 deadline.

Three other groups--the all-Negro Community Interest Corps, the integrated Tuscaloosa Council on Human Relations, and the Student Government Association of the University of Alabama--joined TCAC in preparing and sponsoring the Head Start application. More than 100 workers canvassed high schools throughout the city. And in mid-December, TOP's predominantly-Negro policy advisory committee tentatively approved the application.

Then the city board of education changed its mind about applying. The Rev. T. Y. Rogers, president of TCAC, said the school board was willing to let Tuscaloosa go without Head Start, but it wasn't willing to let anyone else run the program.

"If we got Head Start, the board of education wouldn't be able to run the program. This they couldn't stomach," said Rogers. "They'd rather have anything than have anyone know TCAC is the delegate agency.

"We'd be responsible for bringing a lot of money into Tuscaloosa--$60,000 to $70,000 in two weeks. This is power they don't want us to have, power they don't want poor people to have."

H. D. Nelson, superintendent of city schools, explained the board's switch differently. He said it was due "largely to the fact that some of these groups started asking for permission to use our buildings, school buses, and to rent facilities. We feel the community would hold us responsible for a program in our buildings. We cannot accept responsibility without authority to protect ourselves."

But TCAC's plan offered other choices for the Head Start centers, mostly in churches and on the University of Alabama campus. And when the school board learned that TCAC's application had been approved, it refused to allow UNION SPRINGS--When Ivey Foster started home from his job on Christmas Eve, he was planning to spend the evening with his family.

Instead, he went to jail--and then to the hospital. He was treated for deep cuts and bruises all over his head.

Foster, a Negro, said Wayne Garrett, a white prisoner acting as a trusty, beat him up with a ring of jail keys. Garrett admitted hitting Foster with the keys. But, Garrett said, Foster hit him first.

Foster, 27, works for Union Springs Mayor Frank H. Anderson, who owns a downtown hardware store. On Christmas Eve, Foster said, Anderson gave his employees some Christmas whiskey before closing up around 6:30 p.m.

Foster said he left the store and walked across the street, past two city police officers sitting in a patrol car. "One of 'em called me over and asked, was I drunk? I said no." But the officers took him in the car and drove him over to the jail. Foster said Sheriff C. M. Blue and Garrett were there.

"I asked 'em about making a call, but they wouldn't let me," Foster said. "The white guy shoved me, and one of the officers said, 'If he gives you any trouble, knock the hell out of him.'"

Foster said Garrett locked him up, then came back and took him out of the cell. "I was ahead of him, just making the turn to go down the stairs, when he hit me on the back of the head with the keys.

"I fell. I tried to get up, but he hit me three or four more times. He kicked me in the face and chest. I passed out. Then someone was dragging me down the steps.

"I asked the sheriff to take me to a doctor but he said, 'Shut up, you ought to've been killed.' Someone else said, 'Niggers ain't supposed to live long nohow.' I passed out again. Next thing I knew, I saw Mr. Anderson and his son. Then I was in the hospital."

But Garrett, 21, a Dadeville man awaiting trial for burglary, remembered the incident differently. He said Foster "just kept a-cussin' me. . . 'cause he was drunk and mad. He hit me--that's when I hit him. I had the keys in my hand. . . . He wanted me to whup him, so I whupped him."

Mayor Anderson said he went to the jail because he heard Foster had been arrested. "He had been beaten," Anderson said. "He was bleeding all over his head." Anderson said he signed Foster's bond, had him taken to the hospital, and "called in the state investigators to see if they could ascertain what happened."

Union Springs Police Chief T. W. Tillery said he had no comment.

Sheriff Blue said he wasn't at the jail when Foster was beaten. "I was in my office--I heard a commotion and went on over."

Hospital, U.S. In CR Fight

BY GLORIA GERMAN

MOBILE--In Mobile Infirmary, the largest hospital in the city, a new 100-bed wing is not being used. It was built for the old people who were expected to take advantage of Medicare.

But six months after Medicare began, Mobile Infirmary is still not certified for the program. The federal government says the hospital is not complying with the desegregation requirements of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Spokesmen for the hospital and the federal government this week blamed each other for the situation.

Morton Lebow of the U. S. Office of Equal Health Opportunity (in Washington) said that many doctors on the hospital staff are sending their white patients to Mobile Infirmary, while referring their Negro patients to other hospitals.

But, said the hospital's assistant administrator, John Tucker, "we have not heard of any specific number of Negroes that have to be admitted in order for us to get on the Medicare program."

Tucker said Negroes have been coming into the hospital at a rate of about 14 a day.

But according to Lebow, the government has explained the desegregation requirements to the hospital board--most recently, in a meeting last November. He said the federal agency is willing to explain its desegregation guidelines again, if they are still not clear.

Lebow said a government survey taken from Sept. 25 to Oct. 26 found that of 1,721 patients admitted to Mobile Infirmary, 1,701 were white and 20 were Negro. He claimed that the average number of Negroes coming in daily is much less than 14.

Tucker said the dispute over Medicare has started talk in the community about Mobile Infirmary. "The people are saying that something is wrong with our facilities in the hospital," but this is not so, he said.

B'ham Speaker: 'We Did It'

BIRMINGHAM--"California couldn't do it," said Emory Jackson. "Illinois couldn't do it. But we did it. Alabama did it. We muffled the backlash."

Jackson, editor of the Birmingham World, was speaking to members of the Alabama Christian Movement last Monday in St. James Baptist Church. He said he was disturbed at some slights being cast at Alabama's black leaders. "Of course we didn't have unity," he said. "We weren't after unity."

What were the leaders after? "Mainstream politics," said Jackson. "We wanted to see Negroes operating as Republicans and Democrats, just as electorates all over the country operate as Republicans and Democrats."

Birmingham Negroes have much to contend with, he said:

"We've got 38% of the population, and no percent of the firemen. And out at Samford University, we've still got a school that no Negro is good enough to attend."

Mrs. Scott said she and her family are planning on moving out of Tent City just as soon as they finish the concrete-block house they're building nearby. So is Mrs. Glover, who is building a house in the same area. "We're going to move," they both said, "and leave these tents right here."

They may leave their tents behind, but they will never forget their Christmas Eve in Tent City.

BTW of Montgomery Takes First In Holiday Basketball Tourney

BY ARLAM CARR JR.

MONTGOMERY--High school teams came from all over South Alabama last Wednesday to take part in the ninth annual Holiday Basketball Tournament at Carver High School.

But in the end, there were two local squads--Carver and Booker T. Washington--fighting it out for the championship. BTW won, 59 to 53, in a wild and woolly contest that, at times, looked more like football than basketball.

The championship game was the eighth played during the marathon one-day tournament, which began at 9:30 a.m. and ended at 10 p.m.

For most spectators, the top attraction was Artis Gilmer, the 7' 1 1/2" center who led Carver of Dothan to third place in the tournament. In three games, Gilmer scored 39, 17, and 23 points. And he showed a fantastic shooting touch for such a big man--even sinking 63% of his foul shots.

Dothan coach James Hall said Gilmer, a senior, has been scouted by at least 20 colleges who want him to play for them.

In first-round games, Carver of Montgomery beat Alabama State High (Montgomery), 67 to 49; South Girard (Phenix City) got by St. Jude (Montgomery), 57 to 51; Carver of Dothan topped Hudson (Selma), 73 to 63; and BTW walloped Tuskegee Institute High, 96 to 77.

That narrowed the field to four teams. Led by Allen Belser with 20 points and John Oliver with 18, Carver of Montgomery beat South Girard, 69 to 61.

Then, in the closest game of the tournament, Booker T. edged Carver of Dothan, 74 to 70. Gilmer had four fouls before the first quarter was over, and couldn't play much after that. Arthur Roberts led the BTW scorers with 23 points.

But Carver of Dothan came back Wednesday evening to take the third-place trophy, by defeating South Girard, 79 to 72. South Girard pulled within four points, 74 to 70, late in the game, but Gilmer sank one basket and then passed to Richard Daniels all alone under the bucket to make it 78 to 70.

Two heads-up guards, Douglas Ramsey and Orlando Brown, made Dothan move even when Gilmer was on the bench. Ramsey led Dothan with 24 points, while Otis Ray, with 32, was high for South Girard.

The all-Montgomery final was not as close as the six-point margin made it look. BTW was always in control, sometimes leading by as much as 15 points. Near the end of the game, Carver of Montgomery closed the gap to 55 to 47, and appeared to be gaining. But Willie James of BTW hit two straight baskets to decide the issue.

Herbert Carter scored 17 points for BTW, and Oliver had 14 for Carver.

Booker T.'s Roberts--who tallied 52 points in three games--was named most valuable player.

Because of the holidays, news was hard to find this week. Next week's paper, however, will be back to normal.

Court Upholds School Guidelines

'Last Tick for Tokenism'

Official Says Effect Slight

BIRMINGHAM--"Now I tell you," said Jefferson County Schools Superintendent Kermit Johnson, "whether we can move much faster with peace and harmony--well, I just don't know."

Johnson said he was uncertain about the county school board's future policy, in the light of last week's federal school-desegregation ruling.

Jefferson County and two other Birmingham-area school districts--Fairfield and Bessemer--were directly involved in the cases decided by the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

"We're waiting to hear from our lawyers," said Johnson this week. "As I understand it, the court recommends the (U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare) guidelines as policy for school districts under court order. Whether or not the court laid down the guidelines as absolute law seems to me to be open to question."

But if the guidelines are now the law, what will be the effect on Jefferson County schools?

"Very slight," said Johnson. "It seems the court stipulates mandatory freedom of choice, but this shouldn't make much difference, because we have been accepting all applications for transfer, anyway."

Orzell Billingsley Jr., a Birmingham lawyer who helped present the cases in the appeals court, disagreed.

"Freedom of choice as it now operates," he said, "requires the parents' initiative. This considerably slows the rate of desegregation, as many parents are naturally reluctant to take such isolated initiative." Under the Fifth Circuit's ruling, desegregation will become more the responsibility of school officials.

Billingsley said the schools can handle increased desegregation without

Owls and Alligators

NEW ORLEANS, La.--There are owls and alligators all over the office of U.S. Circuit Judge John Minor Wisdom, the man who wrote last week's school decision.

But the animals aren't alive. They are pictures and statues that friends have given the judge, because he says those animals are symbols of his work.

The owls stand for wisdom--what a judge is supposed to have, and also the judge's last name. The alligators, he says, stand for the backlog of cases always snapping at him.

A lot of Southerners have also snapped at Judge Wisdom since he joined the circuit court bench in 1957. He has become known for his strong decisions in defense of civil rights.

But no one can call Wisdom a "carpet-bag" judge. He grew up in New Orleans, and comes from one of Louisiana's most respected families. He attended Washington and Lee University in Virginia, and graduated from Tulane Law School in New Orleans in 1929.

As a member of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, Judge Wisdom hears cases on appeal from lower courts in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, Florida, and Texas. The only court that ranks above the Fifth Circuit is the U.S. Supreme Court.

Before last week's important ruling, Judge Wisdom had written the decision saying James Meredith had to be admitted to the University of Mississippi.

Integration Speeded Up

BY GAIL FALK

NEW ORLEANS, La.--When the U. S. Supreme Court handed down its original school desegregation decision in 1954, last year's high school seniors hadn't yet entered first grade.

At that time, many people thought that almost all beginning Negro students in the South would be going to integrated schools by the time they graduated.

But, said a panel of federal judges for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals last week, "For all but a handful of the Negro high school class of '66, this right (to a non-segregated education) has been 'of such stuff as dreams are made.'"

"Now, after 12 years of snail's pace progress towards desegregation," said the judges, it is time for integration to proceed with "more speed and less deliberation."

That statement was part of a decision handed down by Circuit Judges John Minor Wisdom and Homer Thornberry, with District Judge Harold Cox dissenting, after they had heard cases involving seven school districts in Alabama and Louisiana.

The decision, written by Judge Wisdom, did more than tell the seven school boards to desegregate. It also gave the court's approval to the federal government's 1966 school guidelines, and set up desegregation standards intended to cover all schools under court order in the Southeast.

That was Tuesday morning, one year from the day that Samuel L. Younge Jr., a Tuskegee Institute student, was shot and killed in downtown Tuskegee.

Few Changes In '67 Guides

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA -- The new 1967-68 school desegregation guidelines, mailed this week to school districts complying with this year's guidelines, reveal no major changes in federal policy.

The only substantial change in the 1967-68 guidelines is that school systems using a freedom-of-choice desegregation plan can schedule the 30-day choice period to begin right now, instead of waiting until March 1. This is intended "to give free-choice districts greater time to adjust to changes in enrollment patterns" before classes open in the fall.

The new guidelines use the same percentage "expectations" for desegregation as the present ones. This means that in most cases, school districts must at least double this year's degree of desegregation.

In districts with a "sizeable percentage" of Negroes, "if a significant percent of students, such as 8 or 9%, transferred from segregated schools for the 1966-67 school year, total transfers on the order of at least twice that would be expected," says the 1967-68 Statement of Policies of the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

School districts where only 4 to 5% of the Negro students have transferred are "expected" to triple this figure, and districts with lower percentages of transfers are expected to show "proportionately greater" increases.

Districts that do not comply with the guidelines face loss of federal aid.

GRAVESIDE SERVICE FOR SAMUEL L. YOUNGE JR.

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--"Sammy Younge was an important part of this community," said Benny James, president of the Tuskegee Institute Council, the student government association. "We want to pay tribute to what he lived and died for."

That was Tuesday morning, one year from the day that Samuel L. Younge Jr., a Tuskegee Institute student, was shot and killed in downtown Tuskegee.

At that time, James said he planned to hold a memorial service in the downtown square.

But the only memorial service took place in Greenwood Cemetery shortly before 3 p.m. Tuesday afternoon, when James and four other students quietly laid a wreath on Younge's grave and stood for a moment of silent prayer.

What happened to the plans for a march downtown? James said only, "We decided it would be futile." But other students said that the college administration and Macon County Sheriff-elect Lucius D. Amerson joined the Tuskegee City Council in asking the students not to go downtown.

The city council issued its statement in response to James' request for a parade permit. The city "has no ordinance dealing with parades..." the council said.

But, the council added, during past demonstrations "law and order have not always been maintained.... The emotions of students and other citizens are such that we think any parade, demonstration, or similar activity would be ill-advised."

Tuskegee Institute President Luther H. Foster said the administration did not forbid the students to go downtown. "We have tried to give them all the facts as we knew them and encourage them to think for themselves," Foster said. "There is no question about its being dangerous to go downtown."

Amerson said he had surveyed the opinions of Macon County citizens, Negro and white. "A larger percent do not feel that demonstrations for no worthwhile purpose is going to serve any benefit to the county, morally and

"Now, after 12 years of snail's pace progress towards desegregation," said the judges, it is time for integration to proceed with "more speed and less deliberation."

That statement was part of a decision handed down by Circuit Judges John Minor Wisdom and Homer Thornberry, with District Judge Harold Cox dissenting, after they had heard cases involving seven school districts in Alabama and Louisiana.

The decision, written by Judge Wisdom, did more than tell the seven school boards to desegregate. It also gave the court's approval to the federal government's 1966 school guidelines, and set up desegregation standards intended to cover all schools under court order in the Southeast.

The seven districts--Bossier, Caddo, Claiborne, and Jackson parishes in Louisiana, and Jefferson County, Bessemer, and Fairfield in Alabama--had argued that they shouldn't have to follow the desegregation guidelines issued by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW).

They claimed the guidelines were unconstitutional, and went farther than Congress meant to go in passing the 1964 Civil Rights Act. (This is one of the arguments the state of Alabama has been using in the big school suit now before a lower federal court in Montgomery.)

The school districts contended that they couldn't be forced to do any more than open the doors of the white schools to any Negro child who wanted to attend.

But the Fifth Circuit opinion said Congress had authorized the guidelines in the 1964 Civil Rights Act, because it wanted to make schools desegregate faster than they had done under court order alone. And that's just what the guidelines do, said the court.

Forcing the state to take responsibility for tearing down segregated school systems, as the guidelines do, is not unconstitutional, said Judge Wisdom's opinion, because the state set up the dual system up to begin with.

The circuit court went farther than saying HEW's guidelines were all right. It issued a decree almost identical to HEW's guidelines, that school boards under court order must now follow.

The Fifth Circuit has never before set comprehensive standards for desegregation. Most school systems under court order have had less strict standards than HEW requires, and almost every desegregation plan has been different.

The appeals court's decree calls for desegregation of all grades by 1967-68, under strict regulations to make sure that freedom-of-choice plans are really free. Any students who don't hand in choice forms must be assigned to the nearest school, regardless of whether it is white or Negro. All school activities, including sports and PTA's, must be open to everyone.

"Faculty integration is essential to student desegregation. . . .as long as a school has a Negro faculty it will always have a Negro student body," said the opinion. And desegregation means more than just one teacher of the minority race on a faculty, warned the opinion.

How strictly these standards are applied to court-order school systems will still depend on the district judge in each area. Now, however, school officials, Negro students, and the district judges all will know in advance what the Fifth Circuit is going to require in any case that comes to them.

Although the opinion said freedom-of-choice plans would still be accept-

Mrs. Jordan Integrates Laundry; Then--On to the Movie Theater!

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

EUFAULA--Mrs. Rosie Jordan integrated the Kwik Kleen Automatic Laundry on Broad St. in downtown Eufaula two Saturdays ago. And she liked it so well she went back again last Friday.

Mrs. Jordan said she didn't have civil rights in mind when she went off to do the family wash. "But the laundry uptown--where the colored go--was just so crowded, I decided to go to this other one instead. It's nearest to me anyway."

There wasn't anyone around when Mrs. Jordan entered the Kwik Kleen coin laundry for the first time. So she just plunked her clothes into the washing machines and sat down.

"Some people came in, looked, turned, and went out. But a few minutes later they came back. No one said anything to me."

But last Friday, Mrs. Jordan said, "I made me a couple of white friends."

She said one white lady started talking to her "about how many children we had--things like that." She said the lady asked her if she always had to do so many loads of wash.

"I told her this was a light week--only 11 loads. I said that since I had seven children, most weeks I filled 12 or 13 machines."

Another lady offered to help Mrs. Jordan fold her clothes when she took them out of the dryer. "I told her no, I had my son to help me. But she was real nice."

Mrs. Jordan said she was so encouraged by the way things went that she plans to take her washing to "two more laundries where the colored just don't go. And I'm trying to get all my friends to use the closest laundry to their homes without worrying about who else goes there."

She has some other ideas about making integration a fact of life in Eufaula. Although the local movie theater was officially desegregated two years ago, she said, Negroes still sit upstairs and whites sit downstairs.

The theater charges 75¢ for balcony seats and $1 for downstairs seats. When Mrs. Jordan went to see "The Ten Commandments" last month, she gave the ticket-seller four quarters.

"He picked up three of them and gave me an upstairs ticket. I handed him the extra quarter and said, 'No, I think I'll sit down here.' Then they tried to tell me I had the wrong ticket to sit downstairs, but I just went on in."

Mrs. Jordan said she went to the movie alone because she couldn't find anyone to sit downstairs with her. But from now on, she said, "whenever I go to the movie, that's where I'm going to sit."

She said she deliberately picked the showing of "The Ten Commandments" to move downstairs: "You know, that's about Moses leading his people out of slavery. It seemed to fit."

Without Really Being Arrested

How to Get Locked Up

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

FITZPATRICK--Mrs. Vinnie Ellis was in the back room ironing when Bullock County's only Negro deputy sheriff, Tom "Preacher" Tolliver, drove up to her gate one day last week.

"He blow on the horn," Mrs. Ellis said. "I told him, 'Come in,' but he said, 'Come out, girl--come in town and sign bond for Cora Blakely. She's in jail.'"

Mrs. Ellis said she didn't believe Tolliver. "I told him I had done heard he was comin' out here to pick me up. But he said no....All the way into town, he kept sayin', 'I'm gonna bring you right back, girl.' But when we got there, he put me in jail."

"I had to stay there all night," Mrs. Ellis said. "My five children was left here alone. I never stay from my children without getting grown people to stay with them, even in the daytime."

While Tolliver was talking to Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Blakely was in the county jail in Union Springs.

"He got me first," Mrs. Blakely said. "He come here, talk with me a little while, and said, 'The inspector man wants to see you.'"

Mrs. Blakely, who manages the Hilltop Inn (owned by Mrs. Ellis), said she already knew the inspector thought she was selling cooked food without a permit. But she didn't know whether any charges had been filed against her.

"I asked, was he taking me to jail? He said no. But when we got down the road a ways, he turned off, drove me into town, and took me to the jail."

Mrs. Ellis--who was charged with assault after a quarrel with her husband--said she asked Tolliver to show her his warrant, but he refused.

"I didn't see it till I was in jail. The jailer stuck it through the bars. It was too dark to read. I didn't know what I was charged with till I was bonded the next day."

Tolliver, who has been working for Sheriff C.M. Blue Jr. for about four months, said he remembered carrying Mrs. Ellis and Mrs. Blakely to jail. But he said he didn't really arrest them.

"I would have arrested them if they hadn't of went with me," he explained.

He denied telling either lady that he wasn't taking her to jail: "They knowed where they was going. They seed the warrants."

TOM "PREACHER" TOLLIVER

Tolliver, who wears a tin badge marked "private watchman," said he is nevertheless a regular deputy sheriff with the authority to arrest anyone who

Negro Killed In Greenville

BY HENRY CLAY MOORER

GREENVILLE --Charlie McCastle, father of five children, was shot to death last Saturday while he and a relative and friends were out hunting in the Butler Springs community.

Edmond Carter, a white land-owner, was later arrested and charged with second-degree murder in connection with the death of McCastle, a Negro from Pensacola, Fla.

Last Monday, C.B. McCastle Jr., 18, a witness to the shooting, talked about the death of his 32-year-old cousin. He sat in front of the fire in his old frame house, and 10 members of his family--mother, father, sisters, nephews, and nieces--listened to his account.

"Charlie got here at 6:30 a.m. Saturday morning from Pensacola," said C.B. McCastle Jr. "We had breakfast together, and my father went with him to find some dogs."

McCastle said he, Charlie, and two other men from Pensacola were walking on the land where the McCastle family lives when "Mr. Edmond Carter shot at us from his house."

When Carter approached the group of hunters, said McCastle, he "told Charlie to throw down his gun. Charlie said he wasn't throwing down anything." The witness said Carter shot once, and a bullet struck Charlie McCastle in the right temple. "Charlie fired one shot and stumbled backward," said C.B. McCastle Jr.

According to the witness, Carter shot again, and a bullet hit the victim "dead center of the forehead." "Charlie fired again," said C.B. McCastle Jr., "and fell to the ground."

The witness said one of Charlie McCastle's companions, identified as Raymond Gerier of Pensacola, signed a warrant against Carter. Butler County Sheriff Werth Thomas confirmed that a second-degree murder warrant had been issued, and said the case would probably go to the grand jury this spring.

Carter, who is free on $2,500 bond, could not be reached for comment.

FARMERS LOSE LAND IN GREENE COUNTY

BY ROBIN REISIG

WEST GREENE--"They built the house and do the work and own a spot of land--but the other man's got the deeds," said the Rev. John Rice.

About 14 families in Rice's parish received eviction notices in November, ordering them off their spots of land by Jan. 1. (This made a total of 34 evictions in the area this winter.) Now some--like Jack Bizzell--are still in their homes, but they are only being allowed to stay until the weather gets warmer.

"You couldn't build in the cold," Bizzell explained. He said he convinced the "super-man (superintendent) to sell me my house." Although Bizzell built the house himself two years ago, he now must buy it for $150 from the landlord, who furnished part of the building materials, and then he must move it off the land.

"The notice come unexpected on us," Bizzell said. "I wasn't through with my crop."

"The notice come unexpected on us," Bizzell said. "I wasn't through with my crop."

Yet Bizzell is much better off than most of the evicted families in Rice's parish, and elsewhere in the West Greene area. "The majority doesn't even have money to buy a lot," Rice said, "because all this money they made (from the year's cotton crop) they paid in debts and put on the rent of this land."

Most of the evicted families are staying in Greene County. But, said Bizzell, "some people's scared out now." He said his nephew, Walter Bizzell, "went up to the Northern states to work."

"All these people on all this land have been here all their lives," said Jack Bizzell. Now they must leave. Why?

"If there's any power in the vote, that's what it's about," said Rice, who owns his own land. "This county has a majority, 85%, of Negroes. Naturally, if there's anything they (the white people) can do to you, they do it."

The power of the vote matters very, very much in Greene County at the moment. While elections are over elsewhere in the state, Greene County still hasn't elected its sheriff and tax assessor.

Lawsuits are still pending that may put Negro candidates Thomas Gilmore and Percy McShan on the ballot. This would give the Negroes remaining in the county a chance to elect Alabama's second Negro sheriff in this century.

But there are other explanations for the eviction of the cotton farmers. Throughout the South, more profitable crops are replacing cotton. And throughout the nation, machines are replacing men.

Although the cotton fields are far from forests, Jack Bizzell said he was told that his land is going to become timber land for a paper mill.

'History' Made In Wetumpka

WETUMPKA--At mid-week, the grand-jury investigation of the James Earl Motley case was in the beginning stages. But last Monday in the Elmore County Courthouse, said Mrs. Annie Mae Williams, "we made a little history.

"We integrated the ladies' rest room."

Motley died in the Elmore County jail last Nov. 20, shortly after being arrested by sheriff's deputy Harvey Conner. More than 100 Negroes were at the courthouse when the grand jury met Monday.

"They keep the ladies' rest room on the first floor locked," said Mrs. Williams. So she--along with Motley's mother, Mrs. Daisy Varner, and another woman--waited until a white courthouse employee appeared, and then asked to use her key.

"She kept telling us there was (a rest room) downstairs. We asked, 'For who?' but she wouldn't say," said Mrs. Williams. "Finally, she said her key was just for the employees." The employee told the ladies to get a key from the probate judge's office, Mrs. Williams said:

"We asked for the key there, and all the ladies looked at each other. They said the key was lost. But then another lady--who didn't know the key was supposed to be lost--came and asked for it."

After a long period of "waiting around," Mrs. Williams said, a janitor came out and unlocked the door.

"We didn't really have to use it," said Mrs. Williams. "We just wanted to know we could."

Washington

WASHINGTON, D. C.--Last Sunday, Adam Clayton Powell was the chairman of one of the most powerful committees in the U. S. House of Representatives -- the Education and Labor Committee. By Tuesday night, he wasn't even a congressman any more.

On Monday, Powell's Democratic colleagues in the House voted to take away his chairmanship, even though House Speaker John W. McCormack asked them not to. The next day, the full House voted not to seat the New York congressman at all, at least until a special committee investigates his qualifications.

The double defeat came as a surprise to many people in Washington--even to some who wanted to see Powell punished.

For instance, Morris Udall of Arizona, who led the move to take away the Negro congressman's chairmanship, wound up arguing against Tuesday's action, saying it was "depriving" Powell's constituents of representation.

Several hundred constituents and other supporters of Powell--nearly all Negroes--demonstrated outside the Capitol on Tuesday.

"No taxation without representation!" was a popular cry after Powell was unseated. If it meant the people from Powell's Harlem district really weren't going to pay their taxes, the cry became even more relevant Tuesday night when President Johnson asked Congress for a 6% tax increase, to support the war in Viet Nam.

SNCC Chairman Stokely Carmichael blamed Johnson for Powell's troubles. "The main cat you focus on is Lyndon Johnson," he told the Powell support-

ATLANTA, Ga.--Segregationist Lester Maddox, a Democrat, took office last Wednesday as governor of Georgia, promising peace and prosperity during his term.

The day before, the legislature had elected him to the post by almost a 3 to 1 majority.

No one had much doubt about the outcome of the vote by the legislators--least of all Maddox, who sat in a side room of the Capitol building, writing his acceptance speech while the proceedings went on. The legislature is 89% Democratic, and most of the legislators come from districts where Maddox won.

Since neither Maddox nor Republican Howard "Bo" Callaway got a majority in the Nov. 8 election, the legislature was required to pick the governor.

Lawsuits that threatened to spoil Maddox's chances by calling for a new election or a run-off were defeated in state and federal courts.

The last road-block between Maddox and the governor's chair was a well-publicized resolution offered by Representative Mac Pickard of Columbus, which called for a run-off. Any move to take the unpleasant job off the legislators' hands was expected to be popular. Quite a few law-makers were afraid of making enemies whichever way they voted.

There were more Democrats who didn't like the idea of a two-party system, though, as the resolution went down by a vote of 148 to 110.

So the roll was called to decide between Callaway and Maddox. The number of Maddox supporters suddenly ballooned to 182, while the Callaway supporters dwindled to 66.

GOV. WALLACE (BOTTOM) ADDRESSES JOINT SESSION

Wallace Claims Nation Heading for 'Serfdom'

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

MONTGOMERY -- The nation is heading for "totalitarian serfdom" unless the people of Alabama lead the way "to straighten out the mess in Washington."

That's what Governor George C. Wallace told the new state legislature at its opening session last Tuesday. But he didn't get to his main topic right away.

First, the governor told the standing-room-only crowd in the House chamber that his administration had given the people more highways, industry, employment, money, education, health, welfare, prisons, and state troopers than they ever had before.

Then he went on to talk about his "nation-wide movement to bind the federal executive by the rules of law."

"We have moved to the offensive," Wallace said. "The evidence piles up from day to day that the people are fed up with the bureaucrats telling them when to go to bed at night and when to get up in the morning . . . telling us we have not sense enough to run our schools."

"The people are disgusted by the spectacle of federal officials running around the country, encouraging 'peaceful' demonstrations in the streets . . . 'peaceful' riots . . . 'peaceful' assaults with rocks, guns, and Molotov cocktails," the governor shouted.

Under "an incompetent, unrestrained federal judiciary," Wallace said, "our constitutional rights have been dismembered with a broad sword . . . . The federal judiciary has set the torch to the rules of law of our Western culture."

"Never before have so few destroyed so much of so many in so short a period of time," he said.

The governor insisted that his "nation-wide movement" contained "nothing to give offense to persons of any race, creed, or color." But he also criticized "faceless, petty executives" for working toward "vague and ill-defined social ends."

Wallace steps down as governor next Monday, to be succeeded by his wife, Lurleen.

2,000 Ask Free Food For Lee County

OPELIKA--Nearly 2,000 people from all over Lee County have asked the county commissioners for surplus food to help the poor.

Representatives from different parts of the county presented a petition to the commissioners at their meeting last Monday. The Rev. G. R. Young Jr. of the Auburn Voters League said a county-wide survey showed there was "definite need" for the free-food program.

The U. S. Department of Agriculture will give the food away to poor people if the county will store and distribute it. In the past, Lee County officials have said they had no place to store the food. But this week they promised to consider the program.

Besides Young, the petitioners were Raymond Stubbs of Auburn, William Harper Jr. of Opelika, Albert Willis of Loachapoka, and Joe Vickerstaff of Waverly.

'It's Just White Power'

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

UNION SPRINGS--"It's just white power," said James V. Poe, a Negro member of the Bullock-Pike-Coffee community action committee. "They've taken the poverty program out of our hands."

Poe was talking about what happened last week when the tri-county committee met in Troy to hear its screening sub-committee recommend a list of staff members.

Instead, Poe said, the sub-committee presented a resolution naming a white segregationist as director and giving him the power to hire the three other paid employees.

Poe said the 21 committee members present voted 11 to 10 in favor of the resolution. "Eight whites and three Negroes were for it," he said. "Ten Negroes were in opposition."

The man named director was Matt Colley of Troy, now deputy director of the state's anti-poverty office in Montgomery. Colley was appointed to his present job two years ago by Governor George C. Wallace.

The state office is currently being re-organized under pressure from the regional Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) in Atlanta, Ga. An OEO spokesman said this week that he did not know whether the deputy director's job would still exist after the re-organization.

"The office will merge with ATAC (the Alabama Technical Assistance Corporation)," the OEO representative said. "Strict compliance with OEO guidelines will be required."

Although ATAC is integrated, the office where Colley works has never had a full-time Negro employee. "They've said they couldn't find qualified people," the OEO spokesman said, "but we're not satisfied with their explanations."

Colley attended the Bullock-Pike-Coffee meeting, where he was elected community action program director at a salary of $9,600 a year. Robert Harris of Midway, a Negro committee member, said Colley promised his new office would hire Negroes as well as whites.

But Colley this week refused to answer questions about his plans. On Tuesday, he said he was busy picking his staff and would have their names Wednesday morning. On Wednesday, his Montgomery office said he had been called out of town for the day.

Harris and Poe said they thought many Negroes on the tri-county community action committee were disturbed about the way Colley was appointed and the power he was given. But the committee chairman, Jackson W. Stokes, said he didn't know of any reason for the opposition.

"When you have 38 people, you're going to get 38 different opinions," Stokes said this week at his office in Elba. "I wouldn't exactly say the choice was unanimous, but if the split was racial, I didn't detect it."

Poe called the 11-10 vote the result of "politicking." "It's all a cooked-up bunch of junk," he said angrily. But Stokes said the vote was fair and open.

And the OEO office in Atlanta said the resolution does not violate OEO guidelines. "It is the policy of the agency to let the local committee make the decisions on how to hire its staff," the OEO spokesman said.

Amerson Takes Over

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--"I've got a big job ahead," said Macon County Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson, climbing into a shiny black car with a white panel on the front door. "I'm ready to begin."

A few minutes earlier, shortly before 10 a.m. last Monday, Amerson had taken the oath that made him Alabama's first Negro sheriff since Reconstruction.

The 15-minute ceremony in the office of Probate Judge Preston Hornsby was closed to the public and the press. Only Amerson's three deputies, his family, his minister, and his lawyer were there to see him raise his right hand and swear to support the constitutions of the United States and the state of Alabama.

"I will faithfully and honestly discharge the duties of the office upon which I am about to enter, to the best of my ability. So help me God," said Amerson. His first act as sheriff was to swing one of his young sons up in his arms. Then he smiled, shook hands all

Gomillion: Other Posts Matter

TUSKEGEE--The day after Macon County inaugurated its first Negro sheriff, a Negro leader suggested that another political victory was just as important.

Charles G. Gomillion, chairman of the Macon County Democratic Club (MCDC), told a precinct meeting that the election of six Negroes to the county's Democratic Executive Committee last November was a major step toward political equality.

"Good politics is starting at the level where success can be experienced," Gomillion said to the 15 voters from Rockefeller Hill who showed up at the Mt. Olive Baptist Church last Tuesday night. "Yet Negroes were elected to the Democratic executive committees in only three counties--Jefferson, Mobile, and Macon."

"Negroes could have been elected (to the committees) in half a dozen other counties if there had been any concern," Gomillion went on. "But people would rather shoot for sheriff--or governor--or judge on the supreme court. . . . We've been politically deprived for so long, we want to start at the top."

Gomillion also had an answer for the people who have complained that the MCDC moves too slowly and too quietly. "Noise doesn't get us very far," he said. "Threats don't help us much. Emotional reactions. . . can lead to dangerous action. . . . Our objective is to move forward with very little fanfare."

Gomillion said that the MCDC is designed for political education and political action. "This is not a welfare agency. It's partisan politics." He said the club will not sponsor "baby clinics or poverty programs ...or demonstrations. The only demonstrations will be at the ballot box."

In Elmore County Death

No Indictment

MISS EDNA MAE BOWMAN

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

WETUMPKA--No one was very surprised here last Tuesday when the Elmore County grand jury refused to indict anyone for the death of James Earl Motley.

There had been signs all the past week that nothing would be done about Motley, the 27-year-old Negro who died in the county jail last Nov. 20, hours after being arrested on the highway.

Mrs. Annie Mae Bowman saw such a sign on Jan. 5, when sheriff's deputy Harvey Conner came to her house with an order for her daughter, Edna Mae, to testify before the grand jury. Miss Bowman and other witnesses had said Conner beat Motley severely while arresting the victim shortly before his death.

Mrs. Bowman said Conner told her, "Make her (Edna Mae) tell the truth and won't nothing happen. If she tells it like Clark (Ruben Clark, another witness), won't nothing happen. You know I never hurt nobody."

Miss Bowman did not have an easy time with the grand jury when she testified on Jan. 11. "They kept asking me if I ever had a date with Earl," she said.

During her 30 minutes of testimony, she said, "I was saying 'Yes' and 'No' to them. A lady asked me if I knew how to say 'Yes, ma'am.' I said I didn't."

Miss Mary Ann Bowman, who accompanied her younger sister to the courthouse that day, said she saw another sign that something unusual was happening when Dr. Joseph R. Benson, Elmore County coroner, left the grand jury room.

"Dr. Benson was crying when he came out," said Miss Mary Ann Bowman. "Then they had to raise the window and take his coat off."

It turned out later that Benson had shown the jury the death certificate he filled out for Motley. The certificate listed the probable cause of death as "accidental."

Benson explained that while Motley may have been beaten, the victim also fell and struck his head while entering the jail, and then toppled out of his bunk on to the steel floor of his cell.

The coroner's ruling didn't surprise Motley's mother, Mrs. Daisy Varner, or the dead man's brother-in-law, Charlie Foster. They said Benson had told them the same thing weeks earlier.

But Benson's explanation was disputed by a Negro prisoner who was in the jail when Motley died. Although two other prisoners were called before the grand jury, this man was not.

The prisoner said Motley couldn't have stumbled outside the jail, because he wasn't even able to walk. "He was out when he got there, so how in the

Welfare Problem For Wallace(s)

10 a.m. last Monday, Amerson had taken the oath that made him Alabama's first Negro sheriff since Reconstruction.

The 15-minute ceremony in the office of Probate Judge Preston Hornsby was closed to the public and the press. Only Amerson's three deputies, his family, his minister, and his lawyer were there to see him raise his right hand and swear to support the constitutions of the United States and the state of Alabama.

"I will faithfully and honestly discharge the duties of the office upon which I am about to enter, to the best of my ability. So help me God," said Amerson. His first act as sheriff was to swing one of his young sons up in his arms. Then he smiled, shook hands all around, and went out to meet the public.

People had been following Amerson ever since he left his office in the Tuskegee Federal Credit Union building at 9:30 a.m. His two Negro deputies, Eddie M. Ivory and Joseph Merriwether, and his white deputy, Arthur L. Knowles, came along behind him.

Although the wind was cold, the sun was bright. Amerson wore his hat, his gun, his shiny badge, and sunglasses. But he left his dark green jacket in the car.

About 15 people were waiting on the sidewalk to congratulate Amerson. He stopped to shake their hands, while the televison cameramen got it all on film.

"I'm kicking off my campaign. I'm going to run for public office," said Amerson, grinning. The photographers laughed. He climbed into his new car and headed downtown toward the courthouse.

Another 15 or 20 people were waiting to see Amerson at the courthouse. But when Amerson and his three deputies marched up the courthouse steps and into the probate judge's chambers, Hornsby stuck his head out. "Get going," he snapped at the people crowding into the outer office.

"If that's the way he wants it, that's the way it's going to be," Amerson added. The people backed out the door. Then a lady employee pulled down the shade so no one could see inside.

Fifteen minutes later, Sheriff Amerson came out of Judge Hornsby's office. Somebody asked him how it felt to be Macon County's first Negro sheriff. "Feels fine," said Amerson, smiling.

Over at the sheriff's office in the county jail, former Sheriff Harvey Sadler was finishing up his last day on the job. Although Amerson and his deputies weren't taking over until midnight, Sadler had changed his uniform for a business suit.

"Any time he's ready, I am," Sadler said. "I don't think he'll have any trouble. I'll be glad to help him if I can."

"We've had a couple of years of pretty rugged going in Macon County," said Sadler, who replaced Hornsby as sheriff in January, 1965. "I hope it will quiet down now. The people deserve a little rest."

After Amerson was sworn in, he drove around to the jail to let the photographers take a few more pictures. Then he politely told them that was all.

"Perhaps after I serve in office four years, I'll go to Hollywood and try to get in the movies," the new sheriff said. "But right now I'm busy. I've got a big job to do." He got into his car and drove away.

Meanwhile, in Selma, Wilson Baker took office as sheriff of Dallas County. One of the first things he did was to appoint a Negro deputy--45-year-old Nathaniel Holmes.

Committee last November was a major step toward political equality.

"Good politics is starting at the level where success can be experienced," Gomillion said to the 15 voters from Rockefeller Hill who showed up at the Mt. Olive Baptist Church last Tuesday night. # Sheffield Church Sad Over Loss of Pastor

BY JOAN CLARK

SHEFFIELD -- When Father Brice Joyce, a white priest, came to Our Lady of Grace Parish in 1959, the mission consisted of 15 Negroes. Since that time, the mission has grown to 120, and has integrated voluntarily--so that it's "like salt and pepper," one member said.

But now Joyce must leave the mission.

"It came as a great surprise," said

FATHER BRICE JOYCE

Mrs. Margaret Buckner, Joyce's friend and assistant. "They just told him."

The members of the mission were stunned. Many were in tears when Joyce administered the last mass on Jan. 8. According to Mrs. H. E. Mathew, a member of the mission, Joyce "appealed to the people to stay in the church, and to carry on the work of charity they had been doing."

Last Sunday, the people hoped to hear more from Joyce, but instead he was temporarily replaced by Father Raphael Salasek. Salasek told the congregation that Joyce "has been near physical collapse."

"We must be honest," Salasek continued. "There has been opposition in the area which has hurt him very much."

Excerpts were read from the Catholic newspaper that announced the merger of Joyce's parish with the Tuscumbia parish, Our Lady of the Shoals. The paper said Father Gregory Roettger, apostolic administrator for the area, sees the merger as a "solution to the financial needs of the Sheffield church."

According to the paper, Joyce had pointed to the "financial plight of his parish," and "it was following this report by Father Brice that the monastery council made its decision in favor of the amalgamation plan."

Some parishioners said they could see some benefits in the merger plan, even though Salasek said the amalgama-

THE WALLACE FAMILY

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY--In her first days in office, Governor Lurleen B. Wallace faced the possibility that the state may soon lose $96,000,000 in federal welfare money.

The U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has threatened to cut off the money by Feb. 28, unless Alabama promises to run its aid programs without racial discrimination.

This apparently means the state must file a compliance agreement like those required of school districts. Alabama is the only state that has not filed such an agreement, although former Governor George C. Wallace says the state has agreed to "comply with the law."

The former governor referred to the welfare problem last Monday as he introduced his wife at her inauguration. He also noted that the U.S. Public Health Service has begun steps to cut off $800,000 in federal aid to mental hospitals, because of alleged discrimination.

"Just during the past week," he said, "bureaucrats have threatened to cut off funds of old-age pensions to the elderly of our state, and even to deny funds for the care of the mentally ill."

He said this was an "exercise of naked, degenerate power," and added,

ON THE BUTTON

"Of course, this latest in a series of threats over the past 2 1/2 years, shall--like the others--never be carried out."

(The state filed a federal suit last week to block the welfare cut-off. About 200,000 people--mostly very old or very young--would have their welfare checks reduced if the funds are stopped.)

In his introduction, the former governor also said, "Alabama is where freedom lives--and works. That is why the words 'Alabama' and 'freedom' have come to have the same meaning to peoples around the world."

For the first time in public, Mrs. Wallace talked longer than her husband.

"I entered the race for governor for the purpose of permitting my husband to take our fight to the final court of appeal--the people of the United States, in whom rest the ultimate sovereign power of this nation," she said during her half-hour speech.

Mrs. Wallace said the federal government was trying to take over the schools. "This is an effort to gain control of the hearts and minds of our children," she said. "As your governor and as a mother, I shall resist it."

The Wallaces spoke after a gigantic parade of nearly 200 bands wound through the streets of Montgomery from 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. For the first time since 1955, there were Negro bands in the parade--including a swinging group from Carver of Dothan that brought up the rear.

Benson explained that while Motley may have been beaten, the victim also fell and struck his head while entering the jail, and then toppled out of his bunk on to the steel floor of his cell.

The coroner's ruling didn't surprise Motley's mother, Mrs. Daisy Varner, or the dead man's brother-in-law, Charlie Foster. They said Benson had told them the same thing weeks earlier.

But Benson's explanation was disputed by a Negro prisoner who was in the jail when Motley died. Although two other prisoners were called before the grand jury, this man was not.

The prisoner said Motley couldn't have stumbled outside the jail, because he wasn't even able to walk. "He was out when he got there, so how in the world could he fall out the car unless you pull him out?" the prisoner said.

He also said Motley couldn't have killed himself when he fell off his bunk, since the bunk was only 16 inches off the floor.

"How can you crush your head off a 16-inch bunk?" the prisoner asked. "I've seen guys fall off the top bunk and get right back up and snore louder than ever."

He said "four clots of blood about the size of a saucer fell out of his (Motley's) head" when the victim rolled off his bunk. "I picked his head up and laid it across my knee." Then, he said, Motley stopped breathing, and "brains and stuff started foamin' out his nose and mouth."

When Motley first arrived in the jail, the prisoner said, deputies tried to revive the victim by throwing water in his face and digging a quarter under his finger-nail. When neither method worked, the prisoner said, one officer remarked, "Well, he ain't coming to."

After the jury made its report, District Attorney U.G. Jones was unavailable for comment. His office said he was "out of town."

Elmore County Sheriff Sidney Thrash, who replaced Lester L. Holley last Monday, said he hadn't made up his mind whether to keep Conner on as a deputy. He said Conner was "not at present" on the staff, but "we haven't got everything decided yet."

Mrs. Varner, the victim's mother, said her lawyer, Fred Gray of Montgomery, would advise her what to do next. She said she would co-operate with the U.S. Justice Department in its investigation of the case.

"Ain't but one reason," she said. "It's not going to bring him back. But it's going to uncover so many ugly things that's been happening.

"This might have happened for the best."

After the grand jury took no action, U. S. Attorney Ben Hardeman filed criminal charges against Conner in federal court in Montgomery. Conner was charged with depriving Motley of his civil rights, while "acting under color of law of the State of Alabama."

The charge is a misdemeanor--not a serious offense--and it does not have to go through the federal grand jury. If convicted, Conner could be fined $1,000, and sentenced to a year in prison.

SNCC HEAD STEPS DOWN

Stokely Carmichael has said he will not run for re-election as chairman of SNCC. Carmichael made the statement last Sunday on a TV program in Chicago, and repeated it on Monday in Baltimore. He said he would become an organizer, "because it's what I do best." And, he said, his successor would not be as "conservative" as he is.

Fraternity Workers Protest Pay

'Nothing but Slavery'

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA -- "We have here a great university that teaches democracy on the one hand, and practices slavery and perpetuates poverty on the other," said the Rev. T.W. Linton.

Linton was speaking earlier this month at a mass meeting dealing with the wages and hours of the Negro men and women who work in the fraternity and sorority houses at the University of Alabama.

Representatives from more than a dozen of the 44 fraternities and sororities have been meeting since December to organize for improvement of their condition.

"We work 12 hours a day, seven days a week--except Sunday when we work 8 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.," one cook said. Her pay-- $38 a week--seemed to be above average. A maid who makes $27 said she was lucky. Some workers complained that $15-$20 was standard.

"This is nothing but slavery," said another cook. "If one person works in a house and wants to get free and speaks up, and the other five in the house are quiet, the one gets fired."

The workers considered forming a union, so that "if they fire one, all go," said Mrs. Minnie Thomas of the Tuscaloosa Citizens for Action Committee (TCAC). The civil rights group has been meeting with the workers.

'We're going to try to bring it into one umbrella, and say all fraternities are in trouble because all fraternity workers are united now," said the Rev. T.Y. Rogers, TCAC president.

The university administration, at least, now seems willing to listen to the workers.

"There is concern on both sides" about fraternity wages, said John L. Blackburn, dean of men. He said the university is "working on this." Next month, he added, the school is putting all its employees on the federal minimum wage--$1 an hour for non-profit institutions.

But, according to Student Government Association (SGA) President Ralph Knowles, the fraternities are independent of the university, "So it's pretty much up to them how they pay their help."

Rogers noted that TCAC has been working closely with SGA in preparing a Head Start application. "A university whose students participate in Head Start to eliminate poverty is helping to maintain a group of people in a poverty-stricken condition in this community," he said at a mass meeting last Monday.

Constables Run Loose in Macon

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE -- Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson pledged this week that "something will be done" if Macon County's new white constables get in the way of law enforcement.

LUCIUS D. AMERSON

Amerson, the county's first Negro sheriff, refused to say anything more about the sudden appearance of the new constables--the county's chief topic of conversation since he took office last week.

"It's all a lot of talk for nothing," Sheriff Amerson said. "I don't see where it's so important."

But the constables--who make arrests and serve almost all kinds of legal papers--will be in direct competition with Amerson for the money he needs to run the sheriff's office.

At least three white men have been named to the jobs since Amerson was elected last November. Two of the new constables--O.C. Bryant of Notasulga and former deputy L.O. Hall of Tuskegee--were appointed by local justices of the peace since Jan. 1. The third, Willie Kirk Jr., was named by Governor

Sadler said that if he is appointed a constable, he doesn't plan to work against Amerson. "I truthfully believe constables would be a benefit to him, take the pressure off him," the former sheriff said.

"A lot of people blew this up just because he was colored. They're tryin' to make it look like something directed against someone. . . but I think it would be of help."

"I certainly don't want full-time constables in every beat--that's not for the good of the county," Sadler added. "I have just a very, very little time to put into it. I work a 12-13 hour day here at my store."

But at least one new constable does plan to work full-time. Hall, who still wears the brown uniform he wore as one of Sadler's deputies, said, "I'm going to be out there trying to make a living."

Hall said that he asked for his constable's badge after getting encouragement from both races. "Your colored and white have asked for something.... I don't know whether because they didn't want to support (Amerson) or what."

The new sheriff stopped Hall on the street last week, and asked to see his constable's identification. Amerson said Hall didn't show it until "I went to put the handcuffs on him. Then he dug his hands down in his pockets and brought it up. I didn't arrest him. If I had, he'd be in jail."

Hall has now threatened to sue Amerson for false arrest. The sheriff said, "I hope he does."

Amerson warned all constables to show proper identification when asked. "If they don't, I'm gonna lock 'em up," he said. "I'm not gonna have people running around the county wearing badges and I don't know who they are."

Lady Killed In Clarke

BY JOHN C. DIAMANTE

COFFEEVILLE--"She left hor[illegible] went to take some mail down J[illegible] Rd.," said a relative of Mrs. Gr[illegible] Mae Osborne. "It was too late for h[illegible] to go out by herself. They brought word that she had been run over. . . . The law was here, and the undertaker came and got her."

Mrs. Osborne, a Negro, was killed on Highway 69 the night of Dec. 2. Cecil Shepherd, a 29-year-old white man, has been charged with first-degree manslaughter in connection with the death of the 33-year-old mother of three.

"I just can't figure it out," said Shepherd's uncle, "Tink" Shepherd.

"My two boys went off to the ball game in the truck, and then to their sister-in-law's. Cecil jumped in the truck and took off. My boys chased him down the road. By the time they got to him, he'd done had the accident. . . .

"They brought him back to the house. Then they went looking for the hubcaps off the truck, and they found that nigger woman."

SCENE OF HIGHWAY DEATH

Shepherd is out on $2,500 bail, awaiting a hearing during the spring term of the Clarke County grand jury on the manslaughter charge.

State Trooper Marshall Dannelley, who assisted Clarke County Sheriff Hubert Paul the night of Mrs. Osborne's death, said Cecil Shepherd "didn't have a driver's license," and may have been drinking that night.

But Shepherd was not charged with any license violation, and he was not tested for sobriety. These possible violations could not be pursued, "because we didn't see it," Dannelley explained.

"We don't give tests for intoxication," added Sheriff Paul.

Last Saturday night at Scyrene, James Patrick, an 18-year-old Negro youth, was killed by a hit-and-run driver while walking home. When that happened, Sheriff Paul's office got a Mobile toxicologist to perform an autopsy--which indicated that the youth had been drinking before his death.

Mrs. Osborne's relatives say people in the community have tried to help them. "The people here been so nice--white and colored," said one of the victim's cousins. "Course, that's not bringing her back, but they been nice. Bring the children food and clothes--they had the biggest Christmas in their lives."

Visitor Shot By Trooper

BESSEMER--A week after it happened, people in Bessemer and Birmingham were still talking about the death of Anthony Shelton, a 27-year-old Negro from Detroit, Michigan.

Shelton was shot to death Jan. 19 by Alabama State Trooper Mickey Shell, after Shell arrested him on Highway 11.

Colonel C.W. Russell, director of the state Department of Public Safety, said this week that Shell "arrested the nigra for DWI (driving while intoxicated)." While seated in a car with the trooper, Russell said, "the nigra broke and run."

Then, said Russell, "the nigra jumped the trooper, and actually got the gun away from the trooper." Shell scuffled with Shelton, said the colonel, until "the nigra hit him and knocked him down an embankment. That's when (Shell) shot him."

Shelton was in Birmingham to visit relatives--his mother, Mrs. Hattie Shelton; his former wife, Carol; his brother, Mack; and his sister-in-law, Mattie.

Anthony Shelton was hoping for a reconciliation with his former wife, said his brother, and he was on his way to see his mother-in-law when the incident occurred. "He wasn't about to be drunk," said Mack Shelton.

According to the Shelton family, witnesses to the incident said Anthony Shelton lay on the ground, bleeding, for an hour before an ambulance took him to Memorial Hospital in Bessemer. After being transferred, he died in the emergency room of University Hospital in Birmingham.

Last Monday night at a meeting of the Alabama Christian Movement in Birmingham, the Rev. C.W. Woods said about the sudden appearance of the new constables--the county's chief topic of conversation since he took office last week.

"It's all a lot of talk for nothing," Sheriff Amerson said. "I don't see where it's so important."

Hall of Tuskegee--were appointed by local justices of the peace since Jan. 1. The third, Willie Kirk Jr., was named by Governor George C. Wallace last Nov. 29.

Probate Judge Preston Hornsby, who was sheriff here for 15 years, said the present total "gives us two or three more constables than we usually have."

And the governor's office confirmed that applications from former Sheriff Harvey Sadler and several other would-be constables are awaiting action by Mrs. Lurleen B. Wallace.

The law provides for ten regular constables in Macon County, one for each election precinct. With Kirk and another white man, Billy Joe Pugh, filling two rural positions, Mrs. Wallace can name eight more constables if she wants to. And there is no legal limit to the number of special constables who may be appointed by justices of the peace.

Former Sheriff Hornsby admitted that constables "can really cut into the sheriff's fees. Arrest is the only way he's got of making money. There's no salary."

But both he and former Sheriff Sadler said that competition between constables and sheriff's office is nothing new in Macon County. "I used to get mad with 'em (the constables) when I was sheriff," Hornsby said.

"I had constables workin' against me--well, not against me, with me," Sadler said. "People will tell you they weren't active, but they were."

TUSKEGEE -- "I don't think there's a place in a democracy for people who won't accept it when they lose an election," said City Councilman J. Allan Parker. "It's time for the responsible, law-abiding people to stand up and be counted."

A few minutes later, Tuskegee's bi-racial City Council unanimously passed a resolution giving the city's "wholehearted support" to Macon County Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson.

The action came late Tuesday night at the council's first meeting since Amerson was sworn in as the county's first Negro sheriff. The resolution was proposed by Councilman Stanley H. Smith.

Smith said only that "a number of things are happening in our community. . . . These are very trying times." But everyone in the room knew that he was referring to the sudden appearance of several white constables in Macon County.

In its resolution, the city council promised to "extend every cooperation to (Sheriff) Amerson to facilitate his law enforcement role." The council also pledged to "use its good office to discourage any attempt to mar the effective performance of this duly-elected official."

WASHINGTON, D. C.--Former Governor George C. Wallace made a big splash last Wednesday in a Senate hearing on whether Alabama's federal welfare funds should be cut off.

Dressed all in blue, "the special assistant to the governor" energetically attacked the U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW). He said HEW's threat to cut off the federal welfare funds "is an illegal grab for arbitrary power."

HEW wants to stop funds to the Alabama welfare department, because the state will not sign an agreement to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The amount of money involved has been estimated as high as $105,000,000 a year.

Former Governor Wallace told the Senate Finance Committee--which is investigating the possible cut-off--that "there is no discrimination in the Alabama welfare program."

Governor Lurleen Wallace, who didn't come to Washington with her husband, sent a statement in which she took a motherly approach.

"The aged and children do not understand the technicalities of welfare laws. They would understand the pain of an empty stomach, the chill of an unheated stove, the darkness of an unlighted house," she wrote.

Most of the senators seemed sympathetic to Wallace's arguments.

Only Indiana's Senator Vance Hartke tried to shake up the former governor. At one point in the hearing, Senator Hartke told Wallace that "whenever I ask you a simple question, all I get is a speech." But Wallace shot back that making a speech was just what the senator was doing.

Meanwhile in Atlanta, Ga., the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy of SCLC blamed the former governor for Alabama's welfare problems.

"I certainly hope that the new governor, Mrs. George C. Wallace, will see fit. . . to show good faith with the citizens of her state and see that the law is complied with, so the poverty-stricken Negro and white people of Alabama can receive their full benefits," Abernathy said.

Tuskegee City Council Fills Housing Post

TUSKEGEE--Months ago, the City Council created a vacancy on its bi-racial housing authority by appointing one of the Negro members, Dr. T. S. Williams, to fill a gap on the council.

Everybody agreed that the empty housing job should go to a Negro. But when it came time for the final vote at last week's city council meeting, there was some polite disagreement over whether the job should go to a fairly rich man, or to a not-so-rich-man.

"If we're going to move in a democratic direction, we should have at least one member who represents the needs of low-income people," said Councilman Stanley H. Smith, a Negro, in support of Williams' nominee, Allen Waver.

But when the three white councilmen present--J. Allan Parker, John Sides, and Mayor Charles M. Keever--voted for George W. Williams, the two Negro councilmen moved to make the choice unanimous.

"We don't give tests for intoxication," added Sheriff Paul.

Last Saturday night at Scyrene, James Patrick, an 18-year-old Negro youth, was killed by a hit-and-run driver while walking home. When that happened, Sheriff Paul's office got a Mobile toxicologist to perform an autopsy--which indicated that the youth had been drinking before his death.

Mrs. Osborne's relatives say people in the community have tried to help them. "The people here been so nice--white and colored," said one of the victim's cousins. "Course, that's not bringing her back, but they been nice. Bring the children food and clothes--they had the biggest Christmas in their lives."

Bullock Case Stalled

MONTGOMERY -- Attorney Fred D. Gray and four defeated Bullock County Negro candidates face another delay in their election suit. The U. S. Justice Department this week got more time to prepare its case.

Shelton; his former wife, Carol; his brother, Mack; and his sister-in-law, Mattie.

Anthony Shelton was hoping for a reconciliation with his former wife, said his brother, and he was on his way to see his mother-in-law when the incident occurred. "He wasn't about to be drunk," said Mack Shelton.

According to the Shelton family, witnesses to the incident said Anthony Shelton lay on the ground, bleeding, for an hour before an ambulance took him to Memorial Hospital in Bessemer. After being transferred, he died in the emergency room of University Hospital in Birmingham.

Last Monday night at a meeting of the Alabama Christian Movement in Birmingham, the Rev. C. W. Woods said that if action isn't taken in Shelton's case, "they'll just get bolder and bolder."

"Understand me," said Woods. "I don't condone the Negro that does wrong. But white folks talk back to cops. Why don't they get shot and killed for it?"

Capital's Head Start Controversy Stays Hot

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY--Opposing factions in the Montgomery Head Start program continued to slug it out this week, after three local centers were closed for failing to meet state and federal standards.

No one disputed the judgment of Charles R. Shelton, director of the Montgomery Community Action Committee (CAC), that the three centers apparently had made "no effort to meet the standards."

At least one of the centers was closed because it failed to provide an adequate playground. "There was ample space to have had a playground," said Mrs. Bertha D. Howard, chairman of the new Head Start policy advisory committee. "I don't know just why they didn't follow through." Another center, she said, "didn't even meet the health standards."

But to some people in the mostly-Negro Child Development Agency (CDA), which runs the Head Start centers, the closings still seemed like part of a plot--though perhaps an unsuccessful one.

"They want to close all these centers and get all the children centralized at Resurrection and St. Jude," charged Mrs. Carrie Robinson, assistant chairman of the CDA. Resurrection and St. Jude are two large Catholic institutions where Shelton has opened new centers, and where the CAC's proposed summer Head Start classes would be held.

Mrs. Robinson said these institutions are "the only places white people will send their children, because those two have white administrators."

She said of the CAC, "They're trying to get rid of us. . . . The CAC wants to handle the money, and they want to keep the status quo in Montgomery. They know this is where the problem gets solved, if you start with the children. They want to stay with the Job Corps, and things like that."

But Dr. Joseph Stewart, the white dentist who is chairman of the CAC, said "the last thing we want to do" is take the Head Start program away from the CDA. "If we've got an agency doing a good job, that's exactly what we prefer," he said.

And, he added, "there's nothing we'd like better" than to re-open the three centers that were closed this week.

Some CDA supporters have challenged Stewart's credentials as head of the anti-poverty program, because he has been an active supporter of ultra-conservative U. S. Representative William L. Dickinson.

"I was afraid that was going to come up," said Stewart. "My personal philosophy, etc., I never let interfere with what I think is right. . . . This program has the greatest intent of any program the government has ever conducted. It's helping the little children. Anything that helps little children, I am for 100%."

Mrs. Boykin, Rev. Burrell Share Platform

BIRMINGHAM--Two enemies of long standing shared the platform at the Alabama Christian Movement's meeting last Monday night.

The antagonists were Mrs. Emylie Boykin and the Rev. Johnnie Burrell. Mrs. Boykin is an executive of the Jefferson County Committee for Economic Opportunity (JCCEO), the agency that controls federal anti-poverty funds in this area.

Burrell, a Smithfield barber, is president of the renegade Smithfield Neighborhood Council--the only council actively protesting JCCEO policies, and, ever since it protested, the only council Mrs. Boykin's committee refuses to recognize.

Of the two, only Mrs. Boykin had a chance to speak. She asked the people to take part in JCCEO activities, especially the upcoming anti-poverty elections.

Mrs. Boykin, wife of a Birmingham dentist, spoke slowly and clearly, in the manner of a school teacher. "Now how do we elect people?" she began, and went on to explain, very carefully, how there are 16 neighborhoods in greater Birmingham and each will elect a representative to the anti-poverty board.

"This is what we call 'community action,'" she said.

In her only reference to protests against the JCCEO, she said that all some people can do is complain. "Money isn't just given to you," she said. "We have to work for it, and if we don't get it, whose fault is it--ours."

Far to her right on the platform, Burrell listened, sitting stiffly. He has claimed that Mrs. Boykin's committee is part of a "conspiracy" to fritter away federal money--money that could help free black people if it were "spent decent."

But many at Monday's meeting said informally that Burrell's protests have been "too hot," "too hard," and "too wide open."

Later, on the street outside the East End Baptist Church, Burrell explained his criticisms.

The heavily-financed Neighborhood Youth Corps, he said, often does not train people, but merely provides free menial labor for white institutions. He said the JCCEO needs day-care centers, nurses who can teach hygiene, and home economists who can teach young wives how to live on a small budget--not an expensive downtown office and elaborate youth programs.

Burrell also charged that the JCCEO is more concerned with "teaching correct attitudes" than it is with fundamental problems.

As the meeting was breaking up, the Rev. Edward Gardner, who was presiding, said that whatever the problem was, the Rev. F. L. Shuttlesworth, president of the Christian Movement, would settle it when he came to Birmingham.

The doors were clogged with departing members by then, but the Rev. C. W. Woods, pastor of the East End church, took over the microphone and shouted for them to stop. They did.

"Why do we have to wait?" he said, adding that too much protest was being lost in committees. "Rev. Shuttlesworth told us we should learn to take care of our problems ourselves."

Leaders of the Christian Movement commented, however, that Woods has been absent from some important committees. Speaking as he did, said one, "he was out of line."

Another Shooting in Birmingham Area

'Holy Jesus, They Kill My Child for a Dog'

BIRMINGHAM--Robert Lacey, the father of six children, was shot to death last week by a Jefferson County sheriff's deputy while members of his family watched in horror.

Lacey had been charged with failing to take his dog to a veterinarian.

The chain of events that led to Lacey's death began when the dog bit a neighborhood child.

"The boy stuck his arm through the fence," said the victim's wife, "the fence where we always keep that dog penned--you can ask the neighbors. Children rode that dog. But he pulled the dog's ear, and the dog bit him. That's the causing of the whole thing."

The boy's mother complained to the health department, and the department told Lacey to bring his dog in for a rabies test. "He said they could take the dog if they wanted," said Mrs. Lacey. "But we don't have a car, and you know it's hard to ask somebody for a car to carry a big dog like that."

So a warrant was issued for Lacey's arrest. Neighbors said two sheriff's deputies sat in their car in front of the Laceys' home in Powderly for several hours last Friday evening before they went in.

Lacey had been painting the kitchen of the neat cement-block house, and was ready to relax for the evening. He had just gotten out of the shower when the knock came at the door.

"We can always tell when somebody comes up to the house," Mrs. Lacey said later. "We hear them pull up, and then we hear the car door slam. But they were so quiet--all we heard was the knock on the door. Oh, that knock on the door."

"They told him get dressed, he was coming with them," said Mrs. Lacey. "He said, 'Why don't you just take the dog?' and they said, 'The dog's not our business, get dressed.'"

As Lacey was getting dressed, his wife said, his gun fell to the floor, either from the dresser or the bed. The deputies saw it on the bedroom floor.

"They rush in," said Mrs. Lacey, "and the tall one, (M.L.) Wood, go hand to his gun. Little one put his foot down on Robert's gun. Then they throw him against the wall and frisk him all over....

"He hold his hands out to his side in a sign of peace, and say, 'You don't even got to handcuff me, I go to the car,' and they say, 'Boy, you gonna leave here with handcuffs on, dead or alive.'"

Trying to handcuff Lacey, the deputies "shove him back and forth," said Mrs. Lacey. "One to the other. Robert was a big man, had a reputation that way. Could have picked those two up and crushed them like peanuts. But he took it."

"And then," she said, "shoving him like that, the little one stumbled, and that's when the tall one, Wood, whipped out his gun and shot Robert in the leg. Robert was dazed. They pushed him and he stumbled toward me, falling, and I fell with him.

"'Please don't shoot again,' I said, and my little girl came running to see what was happening to her daddy, laying there, bleeding, and I said again, 'Please don't,' and that's when they shot him through the head."

Lieutenant F.A. Smith, a spokesman for the sheriff's department, said "I guess what it was, they said he wouldn't take the dog in. That's all. So I guess they didn't say he kept them from taking it."

"The man was resisting arrest," said Smith. "It's that simple. And he was big."

"There wasn't a sign of not even a scuffle in that bedroom," said Sylvester Brown, who lives across the street from the Laceys and ran over when he heard the shooting.

Brown said the deputies ordered him and other neighbors to move Lacey's body. "Before the coroner came, before any kind of investigation...just plain destroying evidence, far as I can see," he said.

"Just because there wasn't any sign of a scuffle," Lieutenant Smith replied, "that doesn't mean there wasn't a scuffle. We say he (Lacey) lunged....And as far as the officers having the body moved before the coroner got there... who says that's destroying evidence?"

Brown said Deputy Wood "just stood around, just like he owned the place, all the time puffing on a pipe, and when the coroner and them come, he said, 'Y'all want a Pepsi? Got some Pepsis out in the car.'"

For the second Monday in a row, the Alabama Christian Movement found itself discussing a fatal shooting. On Jan. 23, the members had talked about the death of Anthony Shelton, a Negro who was killed by a state trooper.

"I told you they'd do it," said the Rev. Calvin Woods last Monday. "Last week I stood up here and I told you they'd do it." The Christian Movement did not decide to take any action.

Resting at home, Lacey's mother could only say, "Holy name of Jesus, they kill my child for a dog."

Decision Keeps Wilcox Pupils In White School

TUSKEGEE--Charles Cooper spent the night of Jan. 25 in the Macon County jail. When his wife came to get him the next morning, she said, "his face was all swollen up."

This week, Cooper charged that Eddie M. Ivory, a sheriff's deputy, "took his fist and hit me so hard I fell down" on the floor of the jail.

TUSCALOOSA CAFETERIA WORKERS

'Our Kids Are Pushing Mops'

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA -- The anti-poverty program here is putting poor people out of work, says the Rev. T.Y. Rogers, president of the Tuscaloosa Citizens for Action Committee (TCAC).

"The Board of Education has decided to replace adults with Neighborhood Youth Corps (NYC) workers, in violation of the contract they had with TOP (Tuscaloosa Opportunity Program, the local anti-poverty agency)," Rogers said at a mass meeting earlier this month.

Rogers bases his charge chiefly on the fact that at least four elementary schools (Castle Hill, East End, Stillman Heights, and 32nd Ave.) have fewer salaried cafeteria employees than they had before they began using NYC workers.

He said some of the 171 cafeteria workers in the 21 city schools have been phoning him, and discussing the problem among themselves. They are afraid of losing their jobs as the minimum wage goes into effect in the school system.

The cafeteria employees claim that the schools will be able to replace them with NYC workers, who are paid $1.25 an hour by the anti-poverty program. H.D. Nelson, city schools superintendent, said he hoped to meet the new minimum wage of $1 an hour without large-scale firing of cafeteria workers.

TOP Director Jerry Griffin said he had no knowledge that NYC workers have been replacing salaried employees. He said he was "looking into it."

This is not the first time that the NYC program has come under attack. At the December meeting of TOP's predominantly-Negro policy advisory committee, Ross Bonner--who works at the Veterans' Administration Hospital--protested the nature of the work done at the hospital by Negro NYC members.

"I feel Negroes on the whole are doing the same job on this so-called training program that they've been doing all their lives--dusting a jug and pushing a mop," he said. "The white man is standing around and supervising. The white kids are working in physiotherapy or corrective therapy, and our kids are pushing a mop."

NYC Director William Morgan later answered this by talking of the difficulty of placing the young people for training in skilled jobs. "They couldn't bring a skill to a job if they're a drop-out between 16 and 21," he said.

Morgan, a Negro, stressed the educational sessions which the NYC conducts several times each week, and pointed with pride to the "large number of NYC workers" who are "motivated to go back to school."

Some NYC workers--like Miss Bernice Edwards, 21, a Druid High School office worker, and Jessie James, 19, a janitor--say they "love" their NYC jobs.

Others, like Miss Hattie Coleman, 20, and Miss Ella Gowdy, 17, both elementary school cafeteria workers, say they are glad to have their jobs--but largely because of NYC's other educational programs, and because of future opportunities they feel the NYC certificate will open for them.

Miss Gowdy, a dish-washer, said, "They don't trust us with preparing the food." So, she said, she's been learning how to wash dishes--"but I knew that already."

Griffin--emphasizing that he meant nothing personal about Miss Gowdy--said, "I'm not sure she did. There are some people who wash dishes and get them clean, and others who leave food on it. It's a pretty important thing to learn to wash dishes."

MOBILE--A federal judge here has refused the Wilcox County school board's request to re-assign eight Negro students back to Lower Peachtree School. The students, in the seventh and eighth grades, represent half of the 16 Peachtree students who integrated the Pine Hill School two weeks ago.

Wilcox County was ordered to provide a free-choice desegregation plan at the beginning of the fall term. The school board and various federal courts have been trading orders, objections, and petitions ever since.

Some 66 Negro children were planning to attend the white schools in the county, but by the time school opened in September, only three had managed to enroll at the Pine Hill School. When school started up again in January, they were joined by 13 more children from Lower Peachtree.

The school board then complained to Judge Daniel H. Thomas that the addition of five children to Pine Hill's seventh grade, and three to its eighth grade, "greatly overextended the capabilities and enrollment of these grades at Pine Hill."

But the U. S. Justice Department didn't agree. It pointed out that three white children have dropped out of the eighth grade, and two have dropped out of the seventh. It also said there are more teachers per student at Pine Hill than there are at Peachtree, and that while the Negro school has no library, science room, gym, auditorium, vocational building or central heating, Pine Hill has all of these.

For a while, the Peachtree children didn't have a school bus and had to be taken up to Pine Hill by private car. But the court ordered the school board to provide transportation.

So now the children have a bus, but according to some of them, "it doesn't have any flashers and the windshield wipers don't work--it's an old beat-up thing."

Three of the children who transferred to Pine Hill came back to Peachtree because they missed their friends. But the others have adjusted to the change.

"The first day we went up there, the teacher in my home room acted like she didn't want to teach us, but the next day she was all right," said Miss Carolyn Weatherly, one of the students the school board was trying to send back

Prayer Night in Waynesboro

BY JOHNNIE J. CHAPMAN

WAYNESBORO, Miss.--The Friends of the Children of Mississippi in Wayne County met for a county-wide prayer night last Monday to ask God's guidance. The theme of devotion was "Prayer and Faith To Stand and Not To Be Sold Out."

The Friends of the Children of Mississippi are representatives from the 11 Head Start centers in the county, which had hoped to be included in CDGM's new year-long grant signed Monday.

CDGM (the Child Development Group of Mississippi) was not given permission to operate in Wayne County, however, because MAP (Mississippi Action for Progress) is trying to start a Head Start program here. The 11 centers, which have 471 children enrolled, plan to run independently.

Members of the Friends have done all material things possible.

They had asked God's help, but knowing the power of prayer, they thought a county-wide prayer night and sermon would be most effective.

Bishop J.E. Johnson delivered the sermon. In it, he said the people's forefathers hid to pray, but kept the faith and were delivered, only to be sold out by a few leading members of their race.

He told the gathering of more than 146 that the people did not intend to be sold out.

Of Hitting Negro In Jail

CHARLES COOPER

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--Charles Cooper spent the night of Jan. 25 in the Macon County jail. When his wife came to get him the next morning, she said, "his face was all swollen up."

This week, Cooper charged that Eddie M. Ivory, a sheriff's deputy, "took his fist and hit me so hard I fell down" on the floor of the jail.

Ivory admitted that he struck Cooper. But, he said, he hit out only once, in self-defense. "Cooper grabbed me," Ivory said. "He got both arms all the way around my neck. I couldn't struggle loose, so I threw my fist back and hit him."

The incident between Cooper and Ivory, both Negroes, took place shortly after Cooper's arrest for public drunkenness and disturbing the peace.

Cooper said he was drinking beer in the Sunrise Inn, a tavern on the Auburn Highway, when Ivory came in and told him that Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson wanted to speak to him.

"I went out," Cooper continued. "The sheriff was sittin' there in his car. He said, 'Get in, you're under arrest.' When I asked what for, he said 'alertin' the peoples.' What charge is that?"

But Ivory said Cooper was "staggering around outside" when he and Amerson drove up to the tavern. "When he saw us, he broke and run inside," Ivory said. "I went in and got him."

"He was cussing a lot, kept saying 'I ain't drunk--I been drinking. I ain't planning on going to jail,'" Ivory said. "Then he wanted to drive his car to the jail, but we said, 'No sir, not the shape you're in.' We took him on and booked him. Courtesy was given to him same as to anyone else."

"They didn't give me a chance to lock up my car or nothin'," Cooper complained. When they got to the jail, he said, "they didn't have 'alertin' the people' nowhere in the book. So they wrote down 'public drinking.'"

After the sheriff allowed him to make a phone call, Cooper said, "the little deputy took me upstairs. He pushed me. I said, 'Don't push me no more--I'm gonna see the sheriff about this.' He say, 'you're not going no place.'"

Cooper said that as he turned and started for the stairs, Ivory "brought his hand from his hip pocket and hit me."

But Ivory remembered the incident differently. He said Cooper "stood there arguin'" instead of going up the stairs, "so I gave him just a hair of a forcin' on. Then I took my hands off."

Once they got upstairs, Ivory said, "I had to finger among the keys to get the right one. He cussed and said, 'I'll stomp you all over the jail--I ain't goin' in there.' Twice he grabbed me on my shoulder, but I swung loose and told him to stand against the wall.

"Just as I got the door open, he come around and grabbed me. He's a big man--I could feel the strength--I couldn't get free. His head was right above me. . .I threw my fist back. I think my ring struck him. He grabbed his nose and went on back."

Cooper said his nose was bleeding. "It bled all night long. No one never came back. I had to send by the trusty to finally get somethin' the next morning."

Ivory said, however, that he and Chief Deputy Arthur Knowles brought Cooper a towel to stop the nosebleed, and gave him some aspirin. "He wasn't badly hurt," Ivory said. "It was just a cut from that ring. What he needed to do was sleep off that alcohol."

Cooper, a 34-year-old laborer who is studying brick-masonry at Tuskegee Institute, said, "I never had nothing like that happen before during Mr.

Bullock People Accept Food Stamps 'for Now'

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

UNION SPRINGS--A few days before Christmas, Negro leaders in Bullock County told their county commissioners that 2,000 hungry people had signed a petition asking for surplus food.

This week, the commissioners told the Negro leaders that the petition came too late. Instead of free food, the county is going to get food stamps.

"This program has already been approved," said R.E.L. Cope Sr., the commissioners' attorney. "It's definitely set."

Rufus C. Huffman, who helped organize the poor people's petition, said it "strictly stated we preferred the surplus food program because the people don't have to put up any money. Even the poorest have to pay something for those stamps."

"Those signatures didn't have any weight with the commissioners," he noted. "Well, they may be votes later."

But Cope said the commissioners hadn't ignored the petition. "They had already applied for the food stamp program before they received the letter (from Huffman)," he said.

Mrs. Lillie Mae Banks, a Negro lady who met with the commissioners Tuesday morning, said they showed her the application. "It was dated Dec. 16. The petition letter was dated Dec. 23," she reported.

Cope said the commissioners applied for the stamps as soon as they finished considering both programs.

The officials chose stamps because "you can go to the store and buy what you want," Cope said. "In places where they have the commodities, people have complained they have to take what's handed out, and the quality is not of the best."

In addition, he said, "there was some feeling it was a little better for people to participate to a small extent," instead of getting the food free.

But one civil rights worker said most counties with the food stamp program have found that only about 50% of the eligible people participate in it. "The rest can't raise the money," he said.

Oscar L. Bentley Jr., who directs the federal food distribution programs for Alabama, agreed that "you won't serve as many people with food stamps." But, he said, the price is small--a minimum of $2 a person each month--and the stamps are given out in such a way that "the less you make, the less money you put up--and the more stamps you get

Because the stamps are spent like money at local food stores, he said, "you can buy fresh meat, milk, vegetables. It's a wonderful program."

Bentley said it would take 30 to 60 days to set up an office and get the food stamp program under way. "Once we get in, we'll do all we can to get as many people as we can," he said.

"We'll have to see what happens," said Huffman. "If they misuse this, or exploit the people, we'll know about it. We will accept the stamp program for now, but we're going to keep working to get the surplus food."

NEGRO GIRL, 12, SAYS SHE WAS ATTACKED

Alex City Jury Acquits White Man of Sex Charge

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

ALEXANDER CITY -- A murmur of surprise ran through the Alex City courtroom last Monday evening when the jury announced its verdict in the case of a white man charged with "carnal knowledge" of a 12-year-old Negro girl.

The ten white men and two white women lined up before Circuit Judge L. J. Tyner and told him that, after 65 minutes of considering five hours of testimony, they had found Odell Griffin not guilty of having sexual relations with the young girl.

Griffin's friends and relatives--including his star witness, Mrs. Alois McManus--surged forward. Mrs. McManus laughed and kissed him.

While several Negro spectators gasped in protest, the 12-year-old girl and her mother sat quietly, looking stunned. But later some of their friends spoke bitterly about the verdict.

"All outsiders were asked to stay out of this case," said Clinton Thomas. "We trusted the people of Alex City--and they did nothing."

"If it had been a Negro man and a white girl," said Daniel Owens, "well, you know what would have happened."

The girl's mother originally signed a warrant accusing Griffin of forcible rape, which carries a possible death sentence. But the Tallapoosa County grand jury for the west side of the Tallapoosa River lowered the charge to "carnal knowledge of a girl 12 to 16 years old," for which the penalty is two to ten years.

The 12-year-old girl gave nearly all the testimony for the state. She twisted her subpoena between her fingers and spoke softly, repeating the technical terms used by District Attorney Tom F. Young.

On last Dec. 29, she said, Griffin, a salesman, got her father's permission for her to come work for him. "Mr. Odell told me he wanted me to dust and run the vacuum," she said. "But when we got there, we didn't do any kind of work."

Instead, she said, Griffin began pinching her breasts: "He said, 'What is that?' I said, 'I don't know.'" Then, the girl testified, Griffin violated her three times--once on his living room couch, once on his bed, and once on a cot in a cellar room.

The third time, the girl said, "he started hurtin' me. I started cryin' and pinchin' him and tryin' to work my way off from under him . . ."

The girl said Griffin "told me if I told anybody he would kill me." Then she said, he gave her five $1 bills and told her that if she came back the next day he might give her $9 or $10.

The girl testified that she didn't tell anyone what had happened until nearly a week later, when her mother confronted her with the blood-stained clothing she had shoved into a closet.

Griffin's attorney, Tom Radney, said the delay proved Griffin was not the man. He suggested that the girl had been "with a boy in the bushes" and was afraid to tell her mother.

Radney argued that the girl's mother "thought up Griffin as a man to name for the defendant. . .because she had hated him for 14 years." Radney explained that Griffin had testified against the mother in a divorce action in 1954.

But after Radney said that, Judge Tyner told the jury not to consider it as evidence.

The girl testified that no one was at the Griffin home besides herself, Griffin, and a man who came to the door briefly. But Mrs. McManus, the chief witness for the defense, said a relative, Mrs. Ellie Traylor, was "sewin' bedlinens in the back bedroom."

Mrs. McManus said she went in the house and talked with Mrs. Traylor right after she saw the 12-year-old girl and Griffin coming out of the back door.

Mrs. McManus said the girl was wearing "faded blue jeans or pants." But the girl testified that she had on a new pair of dark blue pants with bright-colored flowers on them.

The only other material witness for the defense was Griffin's wife, who said there had never been a cot in the cellar room. The defense did not call either Griffin or Mrs. Traylor to the stand.

Radney did call five character witnesses to say Griffin had a good reputation. "If the state could have found one person to say Odell had a bad reputation, they would have put him up," Radney told the jury.

But after the trial was over, some of Alex City's Negro leaders said they had offered to testify against Griffin. "Young never did answer us," Thomas said. "I guess he thought we wouldn't help his case."

In summing up for the jury, Young stressed the "uncontroverted" evidence that Griffin gave the girl $5 for "no more than an hour and a half."

"What would you pay someone for 1 1/2 hours' work?" Young asked. "It was hush money. . . .To a little girl's magnified eyes, I submit, that five dollar bills looked like 5,000."

"Take this case to your heart," Young told the jury. "Suffer the little children to come unto you regardless of their station in life." If the jury would

Poverty War Begins In Old Hayneville Church

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

HAYNEVILLE -- In an abandoned church outside the Hayneville business district, Lowndes County residents are building a headquarters for their anti-poverty program.

While the planks and beams are being hammered into place, project director D. Robert Smith is planning basic adult education classes and pre-vocational training for the nine-month, $241,604 federal program.

In fact, basic-education classes are already being conducted at centers in Ash Creek and Calhoun, for about 130 Lowndes County Negroes.

Eventually, Smith said this week, the classes will be trimmed down to 100 people who meet the qualifications for the program. To qualify for the training and the $20-a-week stipend that goes with it, he said, Lowndes residents must be between 18 and 55, with net incomes of less than $1,000 a year, and they must be "functioning at the sixth-grade level or below."

One reading test given to 90 students last month, he said, the average rating was "well below" sixth-grade standards.

Although all the present students are Negroes, the director said, "this program is for every Lowndes County resident, Negro or white."

D. ROBERT SMITH

Smith, a 34-year-old Negro from Connecticut, worked with the Tuskegee Institute Community Education Program (TICEP) before coming to Lowndes County. The Lowndes program's finance officer is 47-year-old L. H. Anderson, formerly business manager for a hospital in Macon, Ga.

How is the program being received by the white residents of Lowndes County? Smith said the staff was having the same problems "anyone would have--whether they were white, blue, pink, or green. . . . There has been a significant amount of cooperation, considering the circumstances."

The staff had hoped to get an office in the center of town, Smith said, but it ran into "some reluctance" on the part of local landlords. However, a county official was instrumental in arranging a lease on the old frame church in the middle of a white residential neighborhood.

Smith said he intended to spend the federal funds "for the benefit of Lowndes County," by hiring local contractors and laborers whenever possible. He said members of the Lowndes County Christian Movement for Human Rights, the anti-poverty organization, have contributed many hours of volunteer work.

CAC Board Election in Clayton: People Are 'Somewhat Confused'

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

CLAYTON--"You're free to elect whom you want, "said Ben F. Hulen, the white man who is president of the Barbour-Dale-Henry Community Action Committee (CAC). "But I'd hate to see you embarrass your friends and neighbors."

Then Charles Weston, the white man who is the CAC coordinator, started to read off the names of the 12 Negroes who represent the Negro poor people on Barbour County's 50-member CAC advisory board.

When the first board member stood up, Weston asked the 300 Negroes gathered in the county courtroom whether they wanted to keep him or replace him.

There was a long silence. Then John Kelly Jr., another board member, stood up. "I'm somewhat confused over the way this election is taking place," he said.

"I thought people were supposed to go back to their homes and get nominations in their communities," added the Rev. G. H. Cossey. "To stand up and say, 'I'm poor'--that's embarrassing."

"Most of the people making less than $1,000 are not here," said Mrs. Janie Battle. "They're walking, not riding, and this county is very long."

McKinzie Hunter made a motion to call the meeting off. "Let's go back to our communities and do this the right way," he said. "Let's give people a choice." But this motion was defeated.

"The thing that disturbs me more than any other is to have good relationships," said Weston. He called all 12 board members up to the front of the room and asked for other nominations.

Ten more people were nominated. Then someone said that if the whole group voted on all 22, there was no way to be sure that each community would have a representative among the 12 elected.

Someone else wanted to know if white nominees were necessary to meet federal requirements for integration. When Weston said he thought they were, one man tried to re-nominate three white poor people now on the board.

Mrs. Battle jumped to her feet. "That's a 'yassuh,' not a nomination," she shouted. "Don't let no one put words in your mouth. You're people." There was a burst of applause.

It was suggested that the Negroes could elect their 12 representatives, and let the whites hold a separate meeting. But Mrs. Battle objected. "I move that this entire election be tabled, instead of just a part," she said.

As Weston and Mrs. Battle discussed it, people began to leave. James K. Ward, the Negro who is the CAC's assistant coordinator, looked up.

"If you want to tear up community action, you've picked a good way of doing it," he shouted. "It has to be target area people make the decisions, not Mr. Weston and Mrs. Battle."

Finally, everyone stood up in favor of Mrs. Battle's motion to put off the elec-

Jury Convicts Atlanta Man Of Murdering Negro Boy

BY JIM SMITH

ATLANTA, Ga.--An all-white jury deliberated six hours last Wednesday, and then convicted William James, a 42-year-old white man, of murdering Hulet M. Varner, a 15-year-old Negro boy.

On the jury's recommendation, Fulton County Superior Court Judge Stonewall Dyer sentenced James to life imprisonment.

Varner's murder had set off a series of violent disturbances that lasted for three nights last September.

Two witnesses in the trial, Eddie Foote and Ronald Warbington, testified that they were in a coin laundry on the night of Sept. 10, when they saw a car driven by a white woman pull up at an intersection.

They said a man seated next to the woman asked two Negro youths standing at the corner, "What did you say, boy?"

The man--identified as James--opened fire as one of the youths approached him, the witnesses said. When the car turned and came back, they said, the man fired again, wounding a white policeman who had reached the scene.

James' lawyers, Charles Muskett and Charles Moore, said their client was only trying to protect himself and his wife when the shooting occurred. They defended the killing as "justifiable homicide."

"I think they were going to kill him and rape his wife," said Muskett in his closing argument. "If I had been in that position," he said, "I'd have shot those niggers--I'd have blown their brains out."

Prosecutor George McPherson asked the 10 men and two women on the jury "to destroy an ugly, vicious stigma--that a white man will not be convicted in the South of murdering a Negro."

Ninety people were arrested, at least 20 were injured, and two stores were set afire in the disturbances that followed Varner's death. It was Atlanta's second siege of rioting in five days.

Radney told the jury.

But after the trial was over, some of Alex City's Negro leaders said they had offered to testify against Griffin. "Young never did answer us," Thomas said. "I guess he thought we wouldn't help his case."

In summing up for the jury, Young stressed the "uncontroverted" evidence that Griffin gave the girl $5 for "no more than an hour and a half."

"What would you pay someone for 1 1/2 hours' work?" Young asked. "It was hush money. . . . To a little girl's magnified eyes, I submit, that five dollar bills looked like 5,000."

"Take this case to your heart," Young told the jury. "Suffer the little children to come unto you regardless of their station in life." If the jury would not convict Griffin, he said, "God knows what kind of country we're going to have."

Jail Case Figure Pleads Guilty

TUSKEGEE--Charles Cooper was found guilty of public drunkenness last Monday, and given the minimum fine, $42.

There was no mention in court of Cooper's charges that sheriff's deputy Eddie M. Ivory had hit him and knocked him down after taking him to the Macon County Jail.

The incident in the jail had been a matter of controversy ever since Cooper, a Negro, was arrested by the Negro deputy on Jan. 25. But it took Judge Richard H. Powell just two minutes to dispense with the case in Macon County Inferior Court.

"I admitted I was drinking," Cooper said afterwards, "so they only pressed the one charge." A second charge of disturbing the peace was dropped.

Cooper said last week that Ivory had "hit me so hard I fell down." Ivory admitted striking Cooper, but said he hit out only once, in self-defense.

Grenada Man Has Three White Opponents

Negro Seeks Council Seat

BY GAIL FALK

GRENADA, Miss.--"We have never had a Negro to run for any office in Grenada County as we know of--not even in Reconstruction time," said U. S. Gillon, a Negro running for City Council in a special election here next Monday.

"Up to this time," said Gillon as he campaigned at Negro precinct meetings this week, "we've had taxation without representation. . . . Our tax money is paid out to policemen who use it against us."

Negro registration in the city of Grenada has about tripled since the Meredith march came to town last June, bringing the number of registered Negro voters close to the number of white voters.

"Now," said Gillon, "is the time for us to turn to our own people."

Gillon is one of four candidates for the Ward Three city council post. The other three candidates--photographer Robert Alexander Jr., newspaperman Joe Lee III, and insurance salesman M. J. Percival--are all white. The whole city will vote for the man to represent heavily-Negro Ward Three.

The special election will fill the seat left by Gilbert Allen, who moved to Memphis, Tenn., when his Grenada grocery store went out of business last October. Allen filed a suit blaming his loss of business on SCLC and the Grenada County Freedom Movement. Gillon is one of about 70 defendants in that suit.

For the white candidates, Grenada's racial turmoil is the main campaign issue.

U.S. GILLON

Alexander said friends asked him to enter the city council race after he appeared on the Joe Pyne show, and defended the reputation of Grenada's white citizens.

On the show, Alexander said, he blamed Grenada's troubles on "those civil rights agitators," who "screamed and hollered and marched night and day and didn't give us a moment's rest."

Percival said he is "not a superman"--that he doesn't know the answer to Grenada's racial troubles. He said he doesn't believe there is much hope for a return to "the peace and tranquility we used to have," so long as "the federal courts are acting the way they are."

The insurance man--who did business in Selma, Ala., for eight years before moving to Grenada 18 years ago--said he is qualified for the job because he has already served one four-year term on the city council.

Lee, editor of the Grenada Sentinel-Star, said Grenada's most serious problem is "getting back on the road to progress." Solving racial problems, he said, is only one step on that road.

Lee suggested starting a city commerce commission, like a chamber of commerce, to give Grenada the needed "shot in the arm."

A native Grenadian, Gillon moved back to his birthplace three years ago from Chicago, where he was a Fundamentalist minister. Gillon said he was active in Chicago politics, serving as a precinct captain, ballot counter, and poll watcher.

PLAY BALL

NEW YORK--The NAACP Legal Defense Fund (LDF) now has the best infield in the entire civil rights movement. The LDF can field Bill White at first base, Ernie Banks at third, and Maury Wills at shortstop.

At second base, the LDF has to settle for Jackie Robinson--no longer in his prime, but still far superior to any other second-sacker in the movement.

These and other athletes are members of the LDF's new National Sports Committee.

Farmers Joining New Cooperative

MISS SHIRLEY MESHER, ALBERT TURNER, AND JOE JOHNSON

BY ROBIN REISIG

SELMA--Nearly 1,000 small farmers, displaced tenants, and sharecroppers from ten Black Belt counties are uniting in a venture that could make agricultural history.

Called the Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association(SWAFCA), it's a cooperative business that the farmers own themselves.

"We are working to save our farms,

No. 1 cucumbers, 3 1/2¢ to 5¢ a pound last year, are up to 6¢ a pound from Alabama buyers, and 7¢ for out-of-state buyers. Okra has also gone up.

At local meetings, farmers are warned that they are assured of getting these prices only if they stay with the cooperative, and refuse to sign any outside contracts.

Last year, for example, the official price for peas was $70 a ton. But SWAFCA says Negro farmers got between $30 and $60 a ton, depending on the mood of the customer.

ASCS Post Declined

BY JOAN CLARK

HUNTSVILLE--Roosevelt Spragins, the 28-year-old Huntsville farmer who would have been the first Negro on the state ASCS committee, says he has turned the job down.

Orville L. Freeman, the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, announced Spragins' appointment last Jan. 30. But Spragins said this week that he must decline the position, in order to continue operating the farm he shares with his father north of Huntsville.

"When the man came out here about two months ago, I told him I couldn't be in it," Spragins said. "I told him not to turn my name in, but I guess he did anyway."

Spragins said he would like to be on the ASCS (Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service) committee, which sets state-wide policy on such matters as price supports and acreage allotments.

"It would give me experience, and I could learn quite a bit by going out in the county and talking to other people," he said.

But, Spragins said, "here at the dairy, you're really on the spot. You've got to be here all the time.

ROOSEVELT SPRAGINS

If I could find someone to come here and take over when I have to go on a trip, I'd do it, but I haven't been able to find anyone."

Spragins said he told an ASCS official Monday night that he could not accept the committee job.

He said he is not sure what the job involves, but he imagines he would go out to farms like an agent, and help farmers improve their methods.

Auto Kills Two; No Charge Filed

BY JOHN C. DIAMANTE

MILLRY--Earnest Lee Johnson, 32-year-old father of one, was dragged for 40 yards and fatally injured when a car driven by Tilford W. Lankford, 22, a white man, left the pavement of Washington County Road 34 last month.

Johnson's companion--Joseph White, 50-year-old father of six--was crushed to death in the incident last Jan. 28.

Both victims were Negroes who worked in Millry and served as deacons of the New True Light Church in Koyenton.

According to State Trooper F.L. Floyd's official report, Lankford was "exceeding safe speed"--going 60 miles per hour in a zone where the safe speed was 30--when the tragedy occurred. Floyd's report also says Lankford "stated he had drink some beer."

But neither Washington County Sheriff C.J. Sullivan--who came and sat in his car at the scene of the accident--nor the trooper could find anything to book Lankford for.

Last week, Sullivan said he couldn't remember Lankford's full name. Some people in the area, however, say the sheriff is a friend of the Lankford family.

An unidentified white man had run Johnson's and White's truck off the road earlier in the evening of Jan. 28. The two men had gotten J. D. Holston, a white store-keeper, to help pull their truck out of the ditch. Both their truck and Holston's were on the shoulder of the road, facing west, when Lankford's car came around the corner, going east.

"Earnest Lee was putting the chain back in the box," related Holston, a former sheriff's deputy. "I was standing by the door when I saw what looked like a head-on. I went in the cab. I hollered to Earnest Lee to jump behind the cab and when I hollered that, the bad luck happened."

Lankford told the trooper that Holston's bright lights had blinded him as he came around the curve.

"I had my right blinker on--which means 'trouble, slow down' and my dim lights on," said Holston. "I hate to say it--he being a white man--but I think he was blind, coming round the corner like that in a 30-mile zone.

"Why didn't he stop when the accident happened--why did he drag Earnest Lee all that way? If it'd been just me, I'd carried that boy in."

After Sheriff Sullivan arrived on the scene and consulted with Trooper Floyd, Lankford was sent home.

When Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. White went to Chatom to seek more information about their husbands' deaths, Mrs. White said, "the sheriff told us just like this: 'I wasn't even supposed to be out there.' He shoulda knowed something, but he couldn't give us no information."

Negro Says Trooper Slugged Him; Uniontown People Stage Protest

BY ROBIN REISIG

UNIONTOWN--"One state trooper came out of one side of the car," said Francis Walker. "The other came out the other side. Then--wham!" Walker, a Negro, pulled back his fist, and then swung it rapidly toward his forehead.

A large round bandage on his head now covers the wound Walker suffered two weeks ago when, he says, a state trooper attacked him.

The blow knocked Walker out. It also jarred Uniontown Negroes into what many are calling the biggest protest in the town's quiet history.

On Feb. 5, the day after the beating, more than 100 Negroes demanded an explanation from Police Chief E.L. Hancock.

This protest got quick results. Mayor

The trouble began the night of Feb. 4, when the victim, walking towards his home several hundred yards away, was stopped by Uniontown policemen Jimmie Glass and L.E. Stone.

"After I got across the fence, the policeman called me back to the road," said Walker. "He asked me where I was going. . . . He said, 'Did you have a drink tonight?' I said, 'No, I had one soon this morning, when I went and bought groceries for my wife.'

"Then here come a car driving fast, and I said (to the policemen) 'You better watch it or we'll have a wreck in the road.'" The fast car belonged to a state trooper, Walker said. "That time the state trooper hit me," he said, "and I didn't remember anything more

SELMA--Nearly 1,000 small farmers, displaced tenants, and sharecroppers from ten Black Belt counties are uniting in a venture that could make agricultural history.

Called the Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association(SWAFCA), it's a cooperative business that the farmers own themselves.

"We are working to save our farms, our homes, our lives," said SWAFCA Chairman Joe Johnson. "This year, thousands of poor farmers are being driven off the land here, and less land is available to work. Without a massive crash program to help solve our problems, many of us will be driven to the Northern ghettos, as were hundreds of thousands before.

"We are fighting to stay on the land."

So hundreds of farmers--from Dallas, Perry, Wilcox, Marengo, Choctaw, Sumter, Greene, Hale, Monroe, and Lowndes counties--are going to grow vegetables. Their first crops will be peas, okra, and cucumbers.

"If a man grows vegetables, he can realize the same profit off three acres of land as he could off 20 to 30 acres or more in cotton," explained Albert Turner of Marion, one of SWAFCA's three co-ordinators. (Lewis Black of Greensboro and Miss Shirley Mesher of Selma are the others.)

But many of these farmers already knew about growing vegetables. What makes SWAFCA different, its organizers say, is that all the farmers are going to buy supplies, learn new farm techniques, and market their products together.

"When you have 1,500 acres of okra to sell instead of five acres, you can talk different," said Johnson.

While SWAFCA will be an entirely new experience for most Alabama Negroes, cooperatives have flourished in other parts of the country since the Depression in the 1930's. Sunkist oranges, Idaho potatoes, and Washington apples are produced by cooperatives.

SWAFCA's program has two parts. The first, now under way, aims at strengthening the cooperative organization, selecting suitable crops, finding guaranteed markets before planting, and providing information about these crops.

The second part, said a SWAFCA official, will be a long-range effort to teach farmers new ways to manage their farms, buy their supplies, and sell their crops.

The program is designed to educate farmers about crop rotation, fertilizers, and other subjects. "With advanced techniques," said Johnson, "farmers should be able to raise their yield and grow three crops per acre per year. They could net $1,000 an acre."

Meetings are now being held to brief the farmers on growing and marketing developments. According to SWAFCA, peas--$30 to $60 a ton last year--are now up to $90 a ton from Alabama buyers, and $115 from out-of-state buyers. (Selling out-of-state involves trucking expenses.)

No. 1 cucumbers, 3 1/2¢ to 5¢ a pound last year, are up to 6¢ a pound from Alabama buyers, and 7¢ for out-of-state buyers. Okra has also gone up.

At local meetings, farmers are warned that they are assured of getting these prices only if they stay with the cooperative, and refuse to sign any outside contracts.

Last year, for example, the official price for peas was $70 a ton. But SWAFCA says Negro farmers got between $30 and $60 a ton, depending on the mood of the customer.

Negro and white farmers interested in joining the cooperative can write to SWAFCA at 1015 Griffin Ave., Selma, Ala., or contact local cooperative chairman.

Bi-Racial Labor Union Formed in Tuskegee

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--Some people from the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) came to town this week. By the time they left, Tuskegee had its first racially integrated union.

The new union members are the 150 ladies--about 115 white and 35 Negro--who work at Leemar of Tuskegee, the raincoat factory on Gautier St.

Miss Ruby Chaney, the ILGWU business agent who set up Local 426 at Leemar, said the women voted to join the union a couple of weeks ago.

At a closed meeting Tuesday afternoon at Tuskegee High School, the women began to get their local organized.

But everything didn't go smoothly. Two Negro ladies left half-way through the meeting, saying they didn't understand what was going on.

After the meeting was over, two other Negro ladies explained what they thought the problem was.

"Right before the union came in, all the white people were promoted up to the new federal minimum wage--$1.40 an hour," one of the women said. "Negroes get the minimum wage only if they make production--you know, a quota."

She said she understood that only the people who were making the federal minimum would be raised to the union minimum of $1.50 an hour.

"A dime, that's not much," she admitted. "But we'd like to get it."

Gordon Taylor, Leemar's manager, said the ladies would all get their dime. "We don't discriminate at all," he said. "After six months everyone will be making the minimum wage."

The confusion, he said, was over the company's six-month training period. Employees don't get the minimum wage until they learn to make raincoats to company standard.

In the first year, Taylor said, the union contract will give the ladies three across-the-board pay raises, bringing them up to $1.70 an hour by Feb. 1, 1968--the same day the federal minimum wage jumps to $1.60.

In the South, companies often fight to keep the unions out. Why isn't Leemar following the pattern?

"We're part of Cable Raincoat of Boston," Taylor explained. "ILGWU is in all our plants. Naturally, they want this one too."

No white employees wanted to talk about their reasons for accepting the union. But a Negro lady smiled and said, "Oh, it'll probably do us some good."

She said she was satisfied that the union wouldn't discriminate against Negroes. "They put an equal number of both races on the organizing committees," she said. "Some Negroes were nominated for offices.

"I don't think they'll win," she added cheerfully. "There's more white people, so they'll out-vote us. . . that's just the way things are."

Gillon Runs 2nd In Council Race

BY GAIL FALK

GRENADA, Miss. -- U.S. Gillon, a Negro who has been active in Grenada's civil rights movement, and Robert Alexander, a white man who has strongly opposed the movement, will face each other Feb. 27 in a run-off election for city councilman.

Alexander got 1,314 votes in last Monday's special election for the City Council seat, to 1,068 for Gillon. The two other candidates, Joe Lee III and Milton Percival--both white--polled only a few hundred votes each.

Alexander said his large vote total showed that "folks are sick and tired of outside agitators in Grenada." Alexander has recommended arresting civil rights workers.

He said he was "surprised" the vote for Gillon was no larger than it was. The number of Negro voters in Grenada has jumped to about 1,900 in recent months, during an SCLC voter registration and education drive. Gillon's vote represented just a little more than half the Negro registration.

The most serious election complaint from the Rev. F. D. Cunningham, leader of the Grenada County Freedom Movement, was that Alexander--a professional photographer--had snapped pictures of all the Negro poll-watchers. "We saw this as intimidation," he said.

the other side. Then--wham!" Walker, a Negro, pulled back his fist, and then swung it rapidly toward his forehead.

A large round bandage on his head now covers the wound Walker suffered two weeks ago when, he says, a state trooper attacked him.

The blow knocked Walker out. It also jarred Uniontown Negroes into what many are calling the biggest protest in the town's quiet history.

On Feb. 5, the day after the beating, more than 100 Negroes demanded an explanation from Police Chief E. L. Hancock.

This protest got quick results. Mayor T. R. Long and the City Council decided last Monday night to hold a hearing--the first hearing into city police affairs that the mayor can recall--as soon as Walker, now weak and resting at home, is stopped by Uniontown policemen Jimmie Glass and L. E. Stone.

"After I got across the fence, the policeman called me back to the road," said Walker. "He asked me where I was going. . . . He said, 'Did you have a drink tonight?' I said, 'No, I had one soon this morning, when I went and bought groceries for my wife.'

"Then here come a car driving fast, and I said (to the policemen) 'You better watch it or we'll have a wreck in the road.'" The fast car belonged to a state trooper, Walker said. "That time the state trooper hit me," he said, "and I didn't remember anything more till I got to jail."

Walker said he recognized the trooper as the one who arrested him, "broke my teeth out," and "beat me" a year ago, after a disagreement over the registration of a car Walker was driving.

After lying in jail a while, Walker was taken to Uniontown's white doctor. "I told them to take me to any other doctor, but I don't want that man to wait on me," Walker said. The police took him back, untreated, to the jail.

After Walker had passed out a total of four times, a friend saw him and told people about "blood all over the jail." Then Walker's wife came and got him out.

"The way they left that man in jail bleeding really stirred things up," said Willie White, who drove Walker in an ambulance to Hale County Hospital in Greensboro after his release.

Walker says he still does not know what crime he's charged with. He thinks it might be "resisting arrest." Glass, minding the police station while Chief Hancock is out of town, said he's "not allowed to say" what the charge is.

State Trooper Earl Jack Greer of Marion said he was the only patrolman on duty in Perry County the night of Feb. 4, and he has never seen Walker.

Although Walker does not accuse Uniontown policemen of beating him, White said, Negroes are disturbed with the city police because their report doesn't mention the state trooper, and "because the police permitted this to happen while this man was in their custody."

Judge Shuts 11 Schools In Hale, Perry Counties

MOBILE--A federal judge has handed down strict school-desegregation orders in two counties where Negro parents have been protesting since last September.

U. S. District Judge Daniel H. Thomas said that 11 one-, two-, and three-room schools in Hale and Perry counties must be shut down. Some of these schools were practically empty already, because of the actions of Negro parents.

The Martin Mission School in Hale County, for instance, has been boycotted by most of its students since September. And according to Albert Turner of SCLC, boycotts in Perry County already closed the Crossroad School, and have cut enrollment in the Spring Hill School by more than 50%.

Judge Thomas also ordered Hale and Perry counties to desegregate grades two through six next September. (The other grades were desegregated last fall.)

And Thomas repeated some requirements for desegregation plans. According to his orders, all students must be given "complete freedom of choice," and "no choice will be denied for any reason other than overcrowding."

Of 184 Akron-area Negro children who asked to go to mostly-white Hale County schools last fall, only 19 were originally admitted. An order from Judge Thomas later raised the number to 24.

Some students were told they could not attend the white schools because there was no bus transportation available for them. But "the colored bus they rode on went right by the white school," said Mrs. Rose Lee Cheesboro, whose son attends mostly-white Akron High School.

Others were denied admission because they were too old for their grade. And Miss Hattie Pearl Collins, an Akron Public School senior, was turned down for "bad attitude." She had signed her letter of application "Peace and Black Power."

But the new court orders made Hale County Negro parents more hopeful about next fall. "We are telling everyone to fill out the choice forms for the all-white school," said Mrs. Lizzie Mae Bradley.

"We are expecting to make Akron High School (12 grades, mostly white) and Akron Public School (12 grades, all Negro) into one elementary school and one high school."

Toomsuba Opens Center

TOOMSUBA, Miss.--People who live in this rural Lauderdale County community never thought there would be classes again inside their old school.

Weeds had grown up around the old Stevenson School, windows had broken out, and the building had filled up with dust and dirt since all the children were transferred to a big county attendance center eight years ago. In that time, the school had been used as a warehouse, and hundreds of old cartons and packing crates were stored there.

But last week, the county school board said Mississippi Action for Progress (MAP) could use the old block building for Head Start classes, if the community people would fix up the building.

So early last Tuesday morning, the school yard was full of men and women from the community. They hauled cartons, counted the broken windows, burned trash, and talked about the way the rooms would look when the walls were painted.

Citizens Protest Rasberry Death

BY ROBIN REISIG

PRATTVILLE -- Last Feb. 14, Charles Rasberry, a 43-year-old Negro, responded to calls for help from his duplex-house neighbor James Huffman. Wounded in the left shoulder, Huffman was in a gun battle with three white men.

Two days later, Rasberry himself was dead, shot by Prattville Deputy Police Chief Kenneth Hill.

Then, she said, "he reached inside the screen door and got my rifle--the police say it wasn't fired but one time--and he called Rasberry, 'Call the police and ambulance.'"

The front porch was "messy with blood," recalled Mrs. Huffman. She pointed to a bullet hole in her screen door, and four bullet marks in her living room, bedroom and kitchen.

Negro Youth, 18, Shot by Police

BY JOAN CLARK

BIRMINGHAM--James E. Small, an 18-year-old Negro, was fatally shot in the back last Friday morning while running from the site of a break-in at Albert Martin Elementary School in North Birmingham.

According to Police Chief Jamie Moore, officer R.G. Holtam fired "to apprehend a fleeing felon."

The killing occurred shortly after 2 a.m., two blocks from Small's home. Members of his family say he had left the house at about 1:30 a.m. to buy some cigarettes.

Small's sister, Mrs. Charlena Fortune, said this week that she had given him some money in a clip, and he had told her to wait up for him. Police officers reported finding no money on the victim, but Mrs. Fortune said she was told she could pick up a new pack of cigarettes and his hat at City Hall.

When the officers checked the school as they do every night, said Chief Moore, they discovered that a window had been pried open.

"They got around--one officer on one corner, and the other on the other side," said Moore. Then, he said, Holtam saw someone run away from the building and shouted for him to stop.

"The officer shot, and a short time later the body was found just off the school grounds by both officers," said Moore.

Members of Small's family said they were first notified of the incid[illegible]

MARCHERS IN BIRMINGHAM

'Hell No, We Don't Like It'

BY JOAN CLARK

BIRMINGHAM--"I am here tonight because of some unfinished business," said the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth at last Monday night's meeting of the Alabama Christian Movement.

Shuttlesworth, president of the Christian Movement and a veteran of Birmingham's civil rights struggles, spoke to an overflow audience at the Jackson St. Baptist Church.

"Every time you turn around," he said, "some Negro's being killed by some trigger-happy policeman in Birmingham. . . .Every time one of your sons is accused of some crime, some policeman's bullets serve as judge, jury, and courts."

"I think we ought to start tonight, he said, "letting the city know we don't like it--hell no, we don't like it!"

Many people did decide to march that night. About 100 Negroes and whites marched along Fifth Ave. to the steps of the Jefferson County Courthouse. There was a police escort, and the streets were lined with squad cars and paddy wagons.

"Thou shalt not kill applies to policemen as well as to anyone else," Shuttlesworth said.

left shoulder, Huffman was in a gun battle with three white men.

Two days later, Rasberry himself was dead, shot by Prattville Deputy Police Chief Kenneth Hill.

"Buttercup" Rasberry was buried last Sunday with the military honors of a World War II veteran, but the protests over his death are still going on.

The Rev. K. L. Buford, state NAACP field director, said Rasberry--dying of his wounds--told a relative and friend that "they (the police) said he was free to go," and that "as he was leaving, he was shot in the back."

Buford sent a telegram to the U.S. Justice Department, complaining of the "violation of both men's (Rasberry's and Huffman's) civil rights."

Police Chief O.C. Thompson, said Hill shot Rasberry late on Feb. 14, as they were going between the courthouse and the jail. "They say he was attempting to escape," said Thompson. "He hit Hill and knocked him down twice."

Huffman, now confined in the Kilby Prison hospital, is charged with the same crime that Rasberry had been charged with--the murder of William Cranmore, the white man who, according to Huffman's wife, started the shooting.

"A white man's dead and a black man's got to pay," protested one neighbor.

A quarrel over possession of a car led to the shootings that left two dead and one wounded. Huffman had bought the car from Cranmore, his former boss. John Robinson, a relative of Huffman, said Cranmore "nagged at" Huffman about paying for the car.

Before he was confined in Kilby, Huffman told his story to his wife. She said Cranmore and two other white men came to Huffman's house that evening, and asked him to come outside.

"After he got out, Cranmore told (one of the men) to knock him in the mouth," and ambulance.'" said Moore. Then, he said, Holtam saw someone run away from the building and shouted for him to stop.

"The officer shot, and a short time later the body was found just off the school grounds by both officers," said Moore.

Members of Small's family said they were first notified of the incident after 9 a.m. last Friday. At that time, said Mrs. Fortune, Detective Albert Wallace called and asked Small's mother, Mrs. Rosia Small, if her son was at home.

Mrs. Small answered, "No, where is he?" and was told that her son was in the morgue at a funeral home.

Mrs. Small is an active member of the Alabama Christian Movement, and her daughter, Mrs. Fortune, participated in the Freedom Rides and the March on Washington.

Mrs. Fortune said that although her brother had been arrested before, she does not think he was ever arrested for burglary. Moore declined to comment on this, but he said Small did have lengthy juvenile and FBI records.

Small has been out of school for a year, and was working part-time as a mechanic.

"He had a very violent temper," said Mrs. Fortune, "and he don't like white people."

Tell of Refusals, Insults

BY LAURA ENGLE

JACKSON, Miss.--"You all go out and get those bastards and then expect us to support them."

That's what one mother said she was told by a Mississippi welfare official. The woman--mother of several illegitimate children--was testifying before the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission last weekend in the King Edward Hotel.

The advisory committee conducted an open meeting to investigate the policies and practices of the Mississippi Department of Public Welfare.

Other Negro mothers also described their attempts to get welfare help for their children. One woman said she was denied aid because she refused to cross a Freedom Labor Union picket line and work in the fields for $3 a day. Another said her application was refused because she was unable to locate the father of her last child and bring him to the welfare office.

A man from Leflore County, who had lost an arm and a leg and was suffering from heart trouble, said he was told he was not sufficiently disabled to qualify for welfare payments.

Almost every Negro witness testified that he had been discriminated against because of his race. Negroes said they were called by their first names, treated rudely, and made to wait until all whites had been waited on in welfare offices.

One woman told of waiting seven hours in the cold at a Sharkey County warehouse to get her commodity foods. Whites were taken first, she said, then Negroes who would pay 25¢ to the warehouse man, and lastly Negroes who did not pay.

Many witnesses said the help they did receive was not enough. In Mississippi, an Aid to Dependent Children (ADC) grant cannot be more than 31% of what the welfare department computes as the family's need.

Welfare department officials Thomas Pruitt and Flavius Lambert explained that welfare grants could not be raised unless the state legislature voted more money. Pruitt said the legislature wouldn't appropriate more money for ADC payments because of the high illegitimacy rate among Negro recipients.

"Thou shalt not kill applies to policemen as well as to anyone else," Shuttlesworth said. The minister said he does not condone crime, and "as much as I've been arrested in this city, I respect policemen."

With Shuttlesworth's appearance on the scene, protest over recent shootings bubbled to the surface.

Demonstrations continued through the week.

The protest was growing even before Shuttlesworth arrived. Last Sunday, two days after the death of James E. Small, concerned citizens met in the New Pilgrim Baptist Church.

"We are shocked and distressed at the shocking number of Negroes who are being shot and killed in this community," said the Rev. J.E. Lowery, president of the Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance.

Lowery read a proposed petition on reforms in police-community relations. But the Rev. Edward Gardner of the Christian Movement said, "All these petitions are a waste of time, be-

People Talk About Their School Problems

Montgomery

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

MONTGOMERY -- "You're doing a good job," said Anthony S. Butler, president of the Alabama State Teachers Association. "But you're leaving so much for us to do."

The people he was talking to--officials from the U.S. Office of Education --looked away. But the people he was talking for--400 Negro parents from 36 Alabama counties--burst into applause.

That was the way things went last Saturday when the federal officials came to Montgomery to explain next year's school desegregation guidelines.

The people listened politely while Richard F. Fairley, acting regional director for the Office of Education, promised that Alabama schools "are going to be desegregated with or without federal money."

But, later, representatives from several counties stood up to ask whether the guidelines are any good if they're not enforced.

"My five children selected Lowndes County High School in Fort Deposit last year," said Robert L. Strickland. "The principal said all right. Then later he said the superintendent would have to tell the bus driver to carry my children.

"The superintendent said he couldn't provide transportation over 30 miles.... But the bus takes white children from eight, ten miles further away."

"This is not actually freedom-of-choice," Strickland said. "What can we do about it? What can you do?"

"I frankly don't know," said Judge Edward McLaughlin of Anniston, a member of the Alabama Advisory Committee to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

"Serious consideration should be given to re-routing the bus," said Fred D. Gray, a Montgomery attorney who has argued several school desegregation cases.

Collins Harris, a Crenshaw County civil rights leader, said that only a third of the Negro children who applied to white schools there were accepted.

"The transportation is segregated, broke down," he said. "They do not have a horn or a heater." When children talk on the bus, the white bus driver "feels like he will report to the principal and have them suspended," Harris said.

"The bus was put on since the court (desegregation) order," he added. "It goes 60 to 100 miles out of its way every month to keep from passing certain houses on the highway.... It goes through holes where nobody lives, to camouflage..."

Other parents complained that their children are kept off school athletic teams. Teachers said their meetings are still separate from the white teachers' meetings. And nearly everyone reported that faculty desegregation requirements are being ignored.

DEMOPOLIS SCHOOL GUIDELINES MEETING

"From all that I hear and see," said C. H. Bell of Mobile "the burden (of desegregation) rests with the parent. Can't the government find some money to take the burden off the parent?"

"I don't understand why the Office of Education lets the boards of education weasel out under court orders" that are less strict than the guidelines, said Bruce Rappaport, a Miles College teacher.

Gray explained that "the last word rests not with HEW (the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare) but with the courts." Judge McLaughlin said the Justice Department is trying to get some of the court orders strengthened.

Meanwhile, said Miss Deirdre Parker of HEW, "since you're stuck with freedom-of-choice, the best thing to do is work like hell to make it work."

Demopolis

BY ROBIN REISIG

DEMOPOLIS--"They've kept me in jail as much as possible, ever since my son was the first Negro to enter the white high school," said Mrs. Velma Lankster of Linden, mother of 12.

Mrs. Lankster was one of about 200 Negroes and 20 whites from west central Alabama who came to the Demopolis community building last Monday night to discuss the new school desegregation guidelines.

She said she has been arrested "five or six times" since her son integrated the white school. "They search my car," she said. "They find in my handbag one can of beer. Then I was told I have to move from the welfare project."

The Rev. Albert Foley of Mobile, chairman of the committee conducting the meeting, then asked Mrs. Lankster:

"Do you have any evidence the school board or the school superintendent had anything to do with this? Because this is the only thing we're dealing with tonight."

When Mrs. Lankster continued to ask for help, one member of the committee--actually a subcommittee of the Alabama Advisory Committee for the U.S. Civil Rights Commission--suggested that she take her story to the NAACP.

But H.D. Coke, vice-president of the Alabama NAACP, stood up and said, "I

Protest Goes On In Birmingham

BY JOAN CLARK

BIRMINGHAM -- "The people down at the courthouse want to know when we're going to get tired of carrying that casket around," said the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth. "Well, if one casket doesn't get the message across, we can carry nine!"

Demonstrators have been carrying the casket through the downtown streets every evening for more than a week. They also carry signs protesting the killing of nine Negroes by Birmingham policemen in the last six months.

Shuttlesworth told Monday night's meeting of the Alabama Christian Movement that the demonstrations have not been in vain.

But the Negro leaders and the officials didn't agree about everything. The mayor and city council turned down what they said was a request for a "civilian review board" that would oversee the police department.

In a reply to the city officials, the Negro leaders said they weren't asking for a civilian review board. What they wanted, they said, was the appointment of a racially-balanced board of deputy coroners.

Bomb Kills NAACP Leader; Murder Rocks Natchez, Miss.

BY GAIL FALK AND MERTIS RUBIN

NATCHEZ, Miss.--Wharlest Jackson signed off work at Armstrong Tire and Rubber Co. at 8:01 p.m. last Monday night. He had worked at the big tire plant for 12 years. But Monday was his first day as a cement-mixer operator.

He climbed into a pickup truck and started toward home. Four and a half blocks from the plant, a tremendous explosion that shook houses three blocks away blew Jackson from the truck and scattered pieces of the vehicle in every direction.

Natchez and Adams County officials later agreed that the explosion had come from a bomb planted under the driver's seat of the truck.

The explosion occurred at about 8:10 p.m. in front of the home of an elderly couple, David Williams and his wife. Flying bits of metal peppered the tin roof and walls of their frame house.

The next day, Williams recalled the scene: Jackson, he remembered, had to be pulled from under the cab of the truck, which had been blown three houses farther on down the street. "His clothes were tore off him. . . . There was flesh laying all in the street.

"From there on up," said Williams, pointing to his waist, "he was all right. But from there down, he was tore to pieces."

Jackson was dead by the time an ambulance carried him to the hospital.

The tragedy brought forth immediate and shocked response from both Negro and white communities.

Natchez Police Chief J. T. Robinson said city, county, state, and FBI law officers are all working together to arrest the men who planted the bomb. And after that, said Mayor John J. Nosser, "there's no question about a conviction. Something has to be done."

In a front-page editorial, the town paper, the Natchez Democrat, declared, "There is no act in the long history of Natchez that is as wanton, dastardly, brutal, and senseless as the murder of Wharlest Jackson, highly valued employee of Armstrong Rubber Co. and highly respected citizen of the community."

The shock was deep partly because Jackson was well-known and well-liked. People all over town described the 37-year-old father of five as "quiet," "hard-working," and "responsible."

But the incident rocked Natchez for another reason. The bombing closely resembled another bombing just 18 months ago. Negro and white leaders believed race relations in Natchez had improved greatly since then.

A co-worker of Jackson's, George Metcalfe, was nearly killed by an explosion after he left work one evening in August, 1965. Like Jackson, Metcalfe had been working overtime at the Armstrong plant. When he turned on the ignition of his car, a bomb under the hood exploded. Metcalfe was in the hospital for 90 days.

Metcalfe and Jackson had worked together not only at Armstrong but also in the NAACP. Metcalfe is president, and Jackson had been treasurer of the Natchez chapter until a month ago.

After Metcalfe's brush with death, Natchez Negroes started protest demonstrations and a highly effective black-out of white businesses. The months of protest ended with a broad agreement between Negro and white leaders.

Police violence against Negroes declined, many Negroes were hired for "white" jobs, and the city's white leadership began working closely with the Negro leadership. But no arrests were ever made in connection with the Metcalfe

JACKSON, Miss. -- Twenty-nine men were arrested this week on conspiracy charges in two big civil rights murder cases.

A federal grand jury of 18 whites and five Negroes returned the indictments after hearing evidence all last week about the 1964 murder of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia and the 1965 fire-bomb slaying of Hattiesburg NAACP leader Vernon Dahmer.

Goodman, and James Chaney were charged again. They are Neshoba County Sheriff Lawrence A. Rainey, Deputy Sheriff Cecil Ray Price, Bernard Lee Akin, Jimmy Arledge, Horace Doyle Barnette, Travis Barnette, Olen Lovell Burrage, James Harris, Frank Herndon, James E. Jordan, Edgar Ray Killen, Billy Wayne Posey, Alton Wayne Roberts, Jerry McGrew Sharpe, Jimmy Snowden, Herman Tucker, and Richard

Demonstrators have been carrying the casket through the downtown streets every evening for more than a week. They also carry signs protesting the killing of nine Negroes by Birmingham policemen in the last six months.

Shuttlesworth told Monday night's meeting of the Alabama Christian Movement that the demonstrations have not been in vain.

He and other civil rights leaders praised a statement issued last weekend by city officials including Mayor Albert Boutwell and Police Chief Jamie Moore. "This statement alone is worth six months of marching," Shuttlesworth said.

"Ours is a police department for all the people and our belief in equal treatment under the law is sincere," the officials said in response to requests from Negro leaders last week.

"It is recognized that police officers have no right to inflict punishment or use more force than necessary" in making arrests, the statement said. It promised that "excessive force on the part of officers will not be tolerated. Appropriate disciplinary action will result when investigation substantiates such charges."

Civil rights leaders said they were "pleased" by a similar statement issued Wednesday by Jefferson County in writing, and an inter-departmental investigation is and will be made to determine the facts."

But the Negro leaders and the officials didn't agree about everything. The mayor and city council turned down what they said was a request for a "civilian review board" that would oversee the police department.

In a reply to the city officials, the Negro leaders said they weren't asking for a civilian review board. What they wanted, they said, was the appointment of a racially-balanced board of deputy coroners.

The board would "work with the coroner in investigating the deaths of all homicides at the hands of a peace officer," the Negro group explained. "This would relieve the coroner of the awesome and sole responsibility of investigating and judging such homicides."

The Negro leaders renewed their request for human relations workshops for law officers, and the immediate hiring of more Negroes for law enforcement jobs.

They also asked an end to "the practice of sending officers of the law to public meetings in Negro communities when they have not been invited. Negro citizens interpret such action. . .as signs of intimidation and distrust."

The new policy statement from the city lays the foundation for "mutual respect between the police department and the community," the Negro leaders added. "We are grateful for this beginning and we shall continue to be vigilant. . ."

Grand Jury Indicts 29

JACKSON, Miss. -- Twenty-nine men were arrested this week on conspiracy charges in two big civil rights murder cases.

A federal grand jury of 18 whites and five Negroes returned the indictments after hearing evidence all last week about the 1964 murder of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia and the 1965 fire-bomb slaying of Hattiesburg NAACP leader Vernon Dahmer.

Most of the men had been arrested before on the same charges. But the original indictments were thrown out because the grand jury that brought them didn't have enough Negroes.

Seventeen of the 18 men originally indicted for the Neshoba County killing of Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney were charged again. They are Neshoba County Sheriff Lawrence A. Rainey, Deputy Sheriff Cecil Ray Price, Bernard Lee Akin, Jimmy Arledge, Horace Doyle Barnette, Travis Barnette, Olen Lovell Burrage, James Harris, Frank Herndon, James E. Jordan, Edgar Ray Killen, Billy Wayne Posey, Alton Wayne Roberts, Jerry McGrew Sharpe, Jimmy Snowden, Herman Tucker, and Richard Willis.

Two new names--former Neshoba County Sheriff Ethel Glen "Hop" Barnette and Laurel Klan leader Sam Holloway Bowers Jr.--were added to the list. Bowers was also one of the 11 men re-indicted in connection with the Dahmer slaying.

Rights Worker Set Free By Hung Jury in Miss.

BY GAIL FALK

MAYERSVILLE, Miss. --A jury of six Negroes and six white men couldn't agree on a verdict in the case of a civil rights worker tried in Issaquena County circuit court last week.

The jury spent an hour and a half weighing the evidence against Robert Fitzpatrick, who was charged with driving his car too close to the back of a school bus.

Then the jurors came back and told Circuit Judge Ben Guider that six of them thought Fitzpatrick was guilty and six of them thought he was innocent. (A member of the jury said later that the Negroes voted for acquittal and the whites for conviction.)

It was the first time in recent history that Negroes have served on an Issaquena County jury. And it was the first time anyone could remember that a Mississippi jury had failed to find a civil rights worker guilty of charges brought against him in a county court.

The historic case began last Sept. 8 when Fitzpatrick, a law student at George Washington University, was arrested while he was doing research for a school-desegregation suit. He was following an Issaquena County school bus to find out whether it passed the homes of Negro children and whether it was too crowded to carry them.

The bus driver, Mrs. Thelma Chisum, swore out a warrant charging Fitzpatrick with reckless driving. A few days later, a justice of the peace found him guilty and fined him $100.

Fitzpatrick appealed to the circuit court. While he was waiting for his new trial, the charge was changed to following a school bus too closely.

When the case came up in court last week, Fitzpatrick's attorneys--Jonathan Shapiro and Robert Forman of the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law--asked Judge Guider to throw it out. The attorneys argued that Negroes and women were systematically excluded from Issaquena County juries.

The lawyers said that although Negroes are 62% of the adult population in this Mississippi River county, the jury list is only 27% Negro.

But Judge Guider denied the lawyers' request.

The case finally came to trial last Wednesday. The jury heard testimony about the condition of the road. Fitzpatrick said he wasn't following the bus too closely. Mrs. Chisum said he was.

After the jurors reported that they

But the incident rocked Natchez for another reason. The bombing closely resembled another bombing just 18 months ago. Negro and white leaders believed race relations in Natchez had improved greatly since then.

A co-worker of Jackson's, George Metcalfe, was nearly killed by an explosion after he left work one evening in August, 1963. Like Jackson, Metcalfe had been working overtime at the Armstrong plant. When he turned on the ignition of his car, a bomb under the hood exploded. Metcalfe was in the hospital for 90 days.

Metcalfe and Jackson had worked together not only at Armstrong but also in the NAACP. Metcalfe is president, and Jackson had been treasurer of the Natchez chapter until a month ago.

After Metcalfe's brush with death, Natchez Negroes started protest demonstrations and a highly effective black-out of white businesses. The months of protest ended with a broad agreement between Negro and white leaders.

Police violence against Negroes declined, many Negroes were hired for "white" jobs, and the city's white leadership began working closely with the Negro leadership. But no arrests were ever made in connection with the Metcalfe case.

At a mass meeting that overflowed Rose Hill Baptist Church Tuesday night, speakers said the second murder perplexed them. "We thought we had pulled our marching shoes off," said the Rev. Shead Baldwin, NAACP vice president.

"We had begun to think that racism and brutality, that we have in certain counties, had passed away in Adams County," said Julius Calhoun, president of the Adams County Democratic Club.

"What is the answer this time?" was the question asked by every speaker.

NAACP field secretary Charles Evers answered, "We are going to close Armstrong down. . . .We want the Kluxers and all their sympathizers out of Armstrong." After the meeting, nearly 1,500 joined a peaceful march on the Armstrong plant.

Wednesday morning Armstrong's factory manager, Floyd C. Krause, criticized the demonstration. "We feel that Armstrong is being discriminated against," he said.

But Metcalfe, like many Natchez Negroes, thinks Jackson was killed "because of that upgraded job" and that someone inside Armstrong was involved. No Negro had worked the cement-mixer before. Jackson got the job because he had more seniority than all the white men who bid for the job.

Metcalfe, who returned to work at Armstrong last June, said only someone inside the plant could have known Jackson agreed Monday to work four hours overtime.

But Krause said he doesn't believe Jackson's death was "because of the job he held with Armstrong Rubber Co." He said Jackson was one of 40 Negroes who have been placed during the past year in jobs previously held by whites.

Meanwhile, the Natchez Board of Aldermen, Adams County Board of Supervisors, Armstrong Tire and Rubber Co., and some Natchez private citizens joined this week in offering a $36,000 reward for information about Jackson's killers.

...And Prattville

BY ROBIN REISIG

PRATTVILLE--"We're not going to spend our money with the white man when the white man takes our taxes to pay a man to kill us," said Dan Houser, president of the Autatuga Improvement Association (AIA). "No use in paying a man to kill your brother."

Houser is the leader of a group of Negroes who are trying to organize a boycott of white-owned stores to protest the death of Charles Rasberry.

Rasberry, a Negro, was fatally shot by Deputy Police Chief Kenneth Hill two weeks ago. Officials said Rasberry was trying to escape from Hill, who arrested him following a gun battle that killed a white man, William Cranmore.

But Negro leaders said Rasberry told friends before he died that he was shot in the back after police told him he was free to leave.

On Feb. 16, the day Rasberry died, more than 60 Negroes met with Prattville Mayor C. M. Gray. They demanded the hiring of Negro sheriff's deputies and Negro policemen, and the firing of Hill and Sheriff Phillip Wood.

When Gray didn't reply to their demands by their deadline last weekend, AIA leaders called a "selective buying campaign."

Gray explained that he couldn't give an answer until his "city council was in town." But he also said that he didn't expect the council to agree to the demands.

"He said he would let no one...help run the town," Houser said angrily. "I thought it was a Negro town, too."

Although Prattville Negroes have been holding mass meetings every night since the shooting, there were signs that some people didn't agree with the boycott.

Houser admitted that many Negroes are continuing to buy at downtown stores. He blamed the "reverends." "All they do is pray and sing," he said.

Meanwhile, he said, the campaign is being conducted in accordance with the law. There are no pickets around white stores, and no efforts are made to stop Negroes from entering. But AIA members are keeping lists of the Negroes who ignore the boycott, and visiting them to ask for their support.

Prattville's protest is not directed entirely against local officials and businessmen. A SNCC worker, Rap Brown, connected the shooting of Rasberry with the war in Viet Nam. He charged that Alabama is second only to Viet Nam "in the death toll of black men."

Some people have criticized Brown as an "outside agitator." But Houser said the AIA stands behind the SNCC worker's statements. An AIA statement has accused America of "genocide" (the planned extermination of a racial group).

LCDC DROPS LAWSUIT

BY ROBIN REISIG

SELMA--A lawsuit that could have been a landmark in Alabama's civil rights struggle died quietly this week in federal court.

The case challenged Alabama's right to demand that only state-licensed lawyers practice in state courts. The suit argued that Negroes and civil rights workers cannot get fair legal representation from members of the Alabama bar.

Therefore, the suit said, it is "unconstitutional" for the state to deny Negroes and civil rights workers the right to a lawyer of their choice--even if he doesn't have an Alabama license.

The case was scheduled for trial Monday in Selma. Instead, it was settled by agreements filed in U. S. District Court in Mobile.

The Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee (LCDC), which brought the suit, agreed to drop it. And the state agreed to forget about charges against LCDC staff counsel Donald A. Jelinek for practicing law without a license.

Attorneys for both sides stipulated that Jelinek "cannot practice law in Alabama without complying with the laws of the state of Alabama." That means LCDC agreed that Jelinek must be a member of the Alabama Bar Association to practice law in the state.

The agreement also said that Jelinek "is leaving the employ of LCDC and leaving the state of Alabama at this time."

Why did LCDC back down? Alvin J. Bronstein, the attorney in charge of LCDC's Jackson, Miss., office, said only that it was "because they agreed to drop the prosecution against Jelinek."

District Attorney T. H. Boggs of Linden, who arrested Jelinek for practicing law without a license in a Marengo County courtroom last November, was more specific. He said the state dropped its cases against Jelinek because "the main thing we wanted to do was get rid of him, and we did."

The state had several reasons for wanting to get rid of Jelinek. He was the only lawyer in Alabama willing to take almost any civil rights case without pay. And he won several legal battles for his clients.

But Samuel Pipes, an attorney who worked on the case for the Alabama Bar Association, said there was a bigger principle involved. Pipes said the bar association entered the prosecution against Jelinek because "if Jelinek's contentions are correct, anybody can practice without a license."

Bronstein said Jelinek had not applied for an Alabama license because he hadn't lived in the state long enough.

Last Monday--the day Jelinek's suit died in Mobile--another LCDC lawyer, Robert Sobell, went on trial in Louisiana on charges of practicing law without a Louisiana license.

DONALD A. JELINEK

Bronstein said LCDC hopes that a favorable decision in Louisiana will encourage Alabama to change its policy of refusing to let out-of-state lawyers practice in state courts. He said LCDC plans to replace Jelinek and continue operating an office in Alabama.

But District Attorney Boggs said the state is "not going to let LCDC practice. They can handle one or two cases, or be an associate in a matter, but they can't set up an office and solicit business."

'This Is Not the End of the Program'

A FEW WEEKS AGO, D. ROBERT SMITH HAD A CHURCH; NOW IT'S RUBBLE

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

HAYNEVILLE -- Bob Garner didn't hear about it until last Sunday afternoon.

"(Robert) Strickland came in here talking about a tragedy," said the white filling station operator who serves on the board of the Lowndes County anti-poverty program. "I didn't know what he was talking about. I thought maybe some local folks had been in a bad wreck."

But Strickland, board chairman of the Lowndes County Christian Movement, hadn't come to Garner's gas station to talk about an auto accident. He told Garner that the Movement's anti-poverty headquarters--an abandoned church in Hayneville--had been burned to the ground early Sunday morning.

"It was fixed up real nice," Garner said after hearing the news. "A lot of money went into it--a lot of work, too. I did the plumbing."

The blaze began at 5 a.m. Ten hours later, flames still flickered in the heap of rubble that had once been the anti-poverty office. All the carpentry work done by John Hulett, Sidney Logan Jr., and other Christian Movement volunteers was destroyed, and the new desks and chairs were reduced to twisted masses of melted steel.

But even before the ashes had cooled, people were working toward the day when the burned-down headquarters would rise again.

"This is not the end of the program," said Strickland. And Project Director D. Robert Smith said classes will continue in centers in Ash Creek and Calhoun.

Furthermore, Smith said, money will be raised to rebuild both the headquarters and the Macedonia Baptist Church in Fort Deposit. The church was burned to the ground early Monday, after Strickland had spoken there Sunday.

Smith said the headquarters will first be installed in a trailer on the site of the original anti-poverty office. When enough money is raised, he said, a new office will be constructed there.

The fire was the latest setback for the $241,604 federal program. The project--designed to teach migrant farmers new job skills--was held up for several months last year because of objections by former Governor George C. Wallace.

At mid-week, federal, state, and county investigations had produced nothing to show what caused the blaze. "I don't think it was any accident," Smith said. "I think it was deliberate." He said the fire might have been intended as a warning to white people who had cooperated with the program.

Coby C. Coleman, the white cafe owner who leased the old church to the anti-poverty group, didn't want to discuss reports that he had been told the building would be burned. "I won't say yes or no," Coleman said.

There were also reports that Lowndes County Probate Judge Harrell Hammonds--who helped the program get the lease--had had several of his cows poisoned recently.

On Sunday afternoon, a white family was calmly planting trees across the street from the site of the headquarters. "People used to be coming and going all night long," said the lady of the house. "Who knows what was going on in there?"

But Smith said the first days of the rebuilding campaign had turned up "encouraging signs" of support from some white residents of the county.

Smith said the contents of the building had been insured, but "a lot of volunteer work, and a lot of time" had been lost. Nonetheless, he said, "We are determined to run an anti-poverty program for all the people of Lowndes County."

People Criticize New Stamp Plan

BY ROBIN REISIG

SELMA--"How in the world can you buy food stamps with something you ain't got?" asked Mrs. Agatha Harville, who has five children and no regular income. "It's a deal to starve you to death."

When Dallas County changed from a free surplus food program to a food stamp program at the first of the month, many people like Mrs. Harville were upset about it. They said they couldn't

EXPLOSION BLASTS OFFICE

BY MERTIS RUBIN

LIBERTY, Miss. -- An explosion woke the sleeping small town of Liberty about 3 a.m. last Monday morning. The explosion came from the Southwest Mississippi Child Development Council headquarters.

The office, located on Main St. next to a grocery and appliance store, is headquarters for a Head Start program people could think of reasons why someone might want to bomb the CDC headquarters.

The council's staff is 50% Negro and 50% white, according to Director Henrene Matthews. The board of directors, elected at a public meeting, is all Negro. But Matthews said there had been no trouble until now at any of the CDC's 26 Head Start centers.

However, "we were supposed to have some white children enter our center at Fernwood" on Monday, the day of the explosion, Matthews said, "but I don't know right now if they did."

who has five children and no regular income. "It's a deal to starve you to death."

When Dallas County changed from a free surplus food program to a food stamp program at the first of the month, many people like Mrs. Harville were upset about it. They said they couldn't understand why the county replaced its free surplus food program with a plan that made people pay.

In the new program, you pay a certain sum of money to get a larger amount in stamps. The stamps can then be "spent" at local food stores.

"It's obvious that the only reason most business people and officials went for it was to get rid of the surplus food program," charged Miss Shirley Mesher, a civil rights worker. "When folks are getting a little something, you can't work them for nothing."

William Speed, the officer in charge of the food stamp program for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, said the county changed to food stamps because "it gives the people more and better food than they ever had before. They couldn't eat some of the food on the commodity (surplus food) program. It wasn't any good."

"It's a wonderful program," said Mrs. Catherine Revel, the food stamp supervisor. "It lets people participate in the program, select their own foods. And it's good for the community and the grocery stores."

By the end of the first week of the stamp program, 299 Dallas County households had paid $7,000 for $16,000 worth of stamps.

Some of these purchasers complained, though, that they can't buy soap with the stamps, and that they are forced to scrape together food money for a whole month at once.

But "the people that really needs it is the one that won't be able to get anything from it," said Mrs. Clara Walker, who used to receive surplus food.

One woman, with no income and more than $100 in hospital bills, said she couldn't scrape up even the $2 she would need to get $12 worth of food stamps.

Another woman, Mrs. George Campbell, has four children. Their only income is $76 a month from welfare. Under the free food program, she got a "six-food sack every month--it carried me a long way." With food stamps, to get $64 worth of food, she'd have to spend at least $30 of the money that now goes for rent, gas, and clothes.

"My children will probably be hungry now," she said. "I sure do wish free groceries would start back."

"This new program stinks," said Clarence Williams, head of the Dallas County Independent Free Voters Organization. "It's a businessman's adventure, a gimmick to bleed the poor people of the few nickels and dimes they had already. The rich people get richer, and the poor get poorer."

"If the white man says you can get something, OK. 'You're a good nigger,' you get it," said Mrs. Walker, "If not, you can't get it. It's just another knot to tie you to the white man."

came from the Southwest Mississippi Child Development Council headquarters.

The office, located on Main St. next to a grocery and appliance store, is headquarters for a Head Start program serving Pike, Amite, and Wilkinson counties. Jimmy Sharp, a local white man, owns both the office building and the store.

From the outside, the brick Head Start office building looked almost undamaged, except for broken windows. But inside, there was a hole in the floor, some of the ceiling had fallen out, and the wood partitions between rooms were splintered.

Sharp's store did not appear to be damaged. The owner had no comment about the explosion.

AFTER EXPLOSION IN HEAD START OFFICE

The Child Development Council (CDC) is a branch of Southwest Mississippi Opportunity, Inc. (SMO), one of the new Head Start groups set up last year. SMO retained many of the area councils begun under CDGM (the Child Development Group of Mississippi).

No one seems to know what caused the explosion, or even whether or not it was an accident. This week, though, elected at a public meeting, is all Negro. But Matthews said there had been no trouble until now at any of the CDC's 26 Head Start centers.

However, "we were supposed to have some white children enter our center at Fernwood" on Monday, the day of the explosion, Matthews said, "but I don't know right now if they did."

E. W. Steptoe, local NAACP president, said he doubted that the white children had come. "That's what they've been saying ever since they set up here in January," Steptoe said. "There're still no white children in the Head Start centers."

"Some of the staff members of the CDC were the first to integrate some local eating places, but I understand they were told to hold up on that," Steptoe said.

"Everyone seems to think this (the explosion) is a result of that, but the bombing is no surprise to me, because the staff is so well integrated," he added.

Some of the local Negro citizens know there was an explosion just because they heard a loud noise. But the majority of them would rather not talk about the explosion, the Head Start program, or civil rights in general.

Matthews, however, said he is determined to go on. "We're not going to let this stop us," he said on Tuesday. "We didn't even lose a full day's work yesterday."

'It's Time to Move the Man,' Parent Says of Negro Principal

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

MIDWAY--"If a man is in a place for ten years and there's no progress nowhere, then it's time to move the man."

That's what Eddie M. Turner, a parent, said about Fred Chambers, the principal of Merritt High School, at a parents' meeting in the First Baptist Church last Sunday afternoon.

Turner was one of 65 people who showed up at the meeting to discuss the job Chambers is doing as principal of the local Negro high school.

Most of the people seemed to be dissatisfied. They murmured "Yes," and "That's right," when Bobby Hill, the parent who called the meeting, told them, "I think we need a change."

But not all of them agreed with Turner about the kind of change they needed.

"Let's not talk about a fella," said Benjamin Jordan. "Talk to him. This same body ought to be man enough to iron across the table. A man might do better if he understand better. We might could get the problem solved without moving the man."

Another parent replied that understanding wasn't enough. "We want a man there concerned about the people," he said. "We ain't sure we got one."

Then Turner stood up again. "A lot of you all are in poverty," he said. "You ain't supposed to pay tuition. You paid, didn't you? Well, go back to the principal tomorrow to ask for your money, and see what he says."

"I already went," a lady called out. "He said we're not going to get but $3 back."

Wilbon Thomas, head of the Midway NAACP, told the meeting that he had trouble getting Chambers' permission for a group of children to play in Merritt High School's new gym on Sunday afternoons.

"The principal say, well, he didn't go along with playing on Sunday," Thomas reported. "I said the children wasn't in church sun-up to sun-down."

Thomas said he got permission to use the gym from Bullock County Schools Superintendent Edward M. Lindbloom. "Two Sundays we came down and enjoyed the building," he said.

"Then the man with the key said we have to pay him," Thomas continued. "The principal said we'd have to pay. So I called the superintendent and told him these were poverty people, our tax money went to the schools, and that was all the money we had."

Finally, Thomas said, the superintendent ordered Chambers to give the group a key, "but he gave us a key that opened one room. We couldn't get to the equipment."

Since then, Thomas added, the problem has been straightened out.

This week, Chambers said he didn't remember that Thomas' group had to do anything but "get permission and use the proper procedures. . . . Everybody's allowed to use the gym if we know who they are. You wouldn't let a bunch of strangers in your house."

The principal said he follows "board of education policies" in all matters, including use of the gym and collection of school fees. "All that's up to the board and the superintendent," he said. "I do what they tell me."

Chambers also said he didn't take personal criticism very seriously. "People don't like something, they look for a scapegoat," he observed. "Biggest thing is somebody wants to get his name in the paper."

These are the feet of a little boy who attends an open-air school on the island of Jamaica. On Page Three, there are more pictures of this far-away school.

To get to Jamaica, you would have to go all the way down through Florida, past Cuba and into the Caribbean Sea.

Photographer Bob Fitch went to Jamaica earlier this year, to take pictures of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. while King was writing his new book about the civil rights movement.

While he was on the island, Fitch also took pictures of an open-air school, some native fishermen, and a crowded beach. These pictures will appear in the next few issues of The Southern Courier.

Plot to Discredit Dahmer Witness?

Terror on a Lonely Miss. Road

BY GAIL FALK

PASCAGOULA, Miss. -- Jack Watkins, a Pascagoula white man, told authorities last week that five men tried to terrorize him along a lonely road near the Gulf Coast. He claimed they wanted him to cooperate in a scheme for discrediting one of the key witnesses in the Vernon Dahmer case.

District Attorney Donald W. Cumbest said Watkins made a statement saying two strangers came to his home in a Pascagoula housing project the night of Saturday, March 4. One man identified himself as Travis Buckley, county attorney for Jasper County, and the other man was introduced as Billy Ray Pitts, Cumbest said. The two men took Watkins out with them to get some whiskey.

Pitts is one of 12 men charged with conspiracy in the 1966 fire-bombing that led to the death of Dahmer, a Hattiesburg NAACP leader. Buckley is attorney for 11 of the 12 men in the case, which is due to come to trial soon.

Watkins' wife said later that her husband didn't have any idea who the men were. She said he went along because "Jack's always tried to be cooperative with the authorities. He thought maybe he knew something they wanted to know. He tries to do anything he can to keep himself clear."

While the men were drinking, Watkins told the district attorney, Buckley and Pitts said they'd heard Watkins had beaten up Lawrence Byrd of Laurel. Byrd has been identified as an important witness in the Dahmer case.

"Watkins told them he didn't know anything about the Dahmer case except what he read in the paper," said Cumbest.

After that, according to the district attorney, Buckley and Pitts drove Watkins out to a deserted country road, and told him to sign a confession saying he had beaten Byrd. Watkins refused.

Then, said Cumbest, Watkins remembers being told, "We'll let these men talk to you. They'll take care of you," as another car drove up and three men wearing white hoods and black robes got out.

"Buckley had a knife and kept poking it. Pitts hit Watkins with his fist," said Cumbest. But Watkins still refused to sign the confession, so "the Kluxers dragged him from the car and told him to get down in the dust and pray."

While he was kneeling, Watkins told Cumbest, Pitts snapped a pistol five times at the back of his head. Finally, the men took Watkins home.

Why would anyone pick on Watkins?

Cumbest said he thought it was because Watkins is an ex-convict, and "they thought he would be sympathetic

PRIVATE-SCHOOL PAYMENTS RULED OUT

Court Orders Desegregation of All State Schools

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

MONTGOMERY--A federal court this week ordered an immediate end to Alabama's 12-year battle against desegregation of the public schools.

In a sweeping decision directed at state officials and 99 individual school systems, three federal judges said there could be no more interference or delay.

By next fall, the judges ruled, Governor Lurleen B. Wallace and state school officials must dissolve Alabama's "dual school system based upon race."

The 99 school districts--all the local boards not now u court order--were given just 20 days to adopt freedom-choice desegregation plans covering student and teacher assignments, bus routes, and all other school activities.

The 29-page opinion said that state officials had acted in "relentless opposition" all past efforts at school desegregation.

"One of the mos methods" used by the state officials was their obscure the fact that local school authorities h l constitutional duty to desegregate their sch tally," the opinion said.

"T uty to desegregate is a constitutional on court order and independent of any n," the judges declared.

chool districts to adopt freedom-of- 12 grades, the judges warned that "if g factors are not eliminated, freedom of tasy."

"A 'freedom-of-choice' plan. . .is not an end in itself; it is but a means to an end," the opinion said. If the plan does not work, the judges ruled, "some other method" must be found.

The judges ordered State Schools Superintendent Ernest Stone to "develop a detailed program" to make sure that next fall, "no school located in a school district where students of both races are in attendance. . .will have teachers of only one race."

"Faculty and staff desegregation is an integral part of any public school desegregation plan. . .because students are entitled to a nonracial education, and assignment of teachers to students on the basis of race denies students that right," the opinion said.

The judges ruled that the construction of new schools and the consolidation of old ones must be planned "to effect desegregation."

State school officials must bring "the quality of the physical facilities, equipment, services, courses of instruction, and instructional materials" in Negro schools up to the present level in white schools, the opinion said.

The federal panel--U. S. Circuit Judge Richard T. Rives and District Judges Frank M. Johnson Jr. and H. H. Grooms --also ruled unconstitutional an Alabama law providing tuition grants of up to $185 a year for private-school students.

If the state does not stop trying "to establish and support a separate and private school system for white students," the judges warned, the private schools "will need to be brought under this court's state-wide desegregation order."

Rusk Pickets Jailed

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA--It was 6:35 p.m. The 45 Negro and white picketers protesting the Viet Nam war had been circling for nearly an hour in the cold twilight.

Then four of them broke away from the ring of demonstrators and crossed the street to University of Alabama property.

In a pre-planned ceremony, university student officials on the other side of the street asked the picketers to lower their signs. They didn't. Instead, they kept walking--straight in the direction of the university police, who were waiting to ask them to leave, and then arrest them for trespassing after warning.

Those arrested were Miss Nellie Hester, 21, a student at Stillman College; Miss Posy Lombard, 23, assistant director of Recruitment of Southern Teachers; Page Painter, 24, a Woodrow Wilson intern teaching at Stillman; and David Wolf, 21, student body president at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

The four said they were testing a rule forbidding non-university people from

Lowndes Office Re-Opens At Scene of Church Fire

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

HAYNEVILLE -- Ten days after its headquarters burned to the ground, the Lowndes County anti-poverty program reopened for business on the same spot.

A gleaming, 50-foot-long office trailer stood amidst the ashes of the old Episcopal church that was the program's first headquarters.

"We're fully operational," program director D. Robert Smith said last Wednesday. "But we're a little behind on certain aspects of our paper-work."

To make sure there is no repeat of the fire that destroyed the church March 12, Smith said, the trailer will be guarded at night.

Two more churches have been burned in the county since the fire at the anti-poverty office. The Macedonia Baptist Church in Ft. Deposit, a Negro church, was burned on March 13, and last Saturday, the all-white Good Hope Presbyterian Church in Benton was destroyed.

Those arrested were Miss Nellie Hester, 21, a student at Stillman College; Miss Posy Lombard, 23, assistant director of Recruitment of Southern Teachers; Page Painter, 24, a Woodrow Wilson intern teaching at Stillman; and David Wolf, 21, student body president at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

The four said they were testing a rule forbidding non-university people from demonstrating on university property. They were allowed to sign for their own bond, and will be tried later.

The planned arrest was one of several protests that greeted U. S. Secretary of State Dean Rusk when he came to speak at the university on Friday.

Why did the four get themselves arrested on university property?

"Free speech doesn't mean anything unless you can go where the people you want to speak to are," Painter said. He said the area designated for non-university picketers was not visible to most people coming to hear Rusk speak.

"The university is trying to organize picketing, as it does everything else," charged Theodore E. Klitzke, chairman of the school's art department. "One of the ways to kill free speech is to organize free speech. Then it's no longer free."

TUSCALOOSA DEMONSTRATOR

The 45 picketers were mostly Stillman students and faculty members, but the group also included Miles College teachers and students, and some Alabama students who joined in.

While many of the demonstrators said they were protesting the war primarily for non-racial reasons, some--including Miss Hester, a Negro, and Miss Lombard, who is white--charged that the war represented "American racism and colonialism."

"They tell us Negroes are going over to insure free elections to those people, and they don't even have free elections here in the states," said Miss Hester.

In his speech, Rusk said that the U. S. must keep its commitments in Viet Nam. He reminded the crowd of 4,000 of the lessons of history, of World War II, and of "giving (the enemy) a little country or two." At the end of his talk, the secretary received a standing ovation.

But before he left, he had also received a petition signed by 520 Tuskegee Institute students, saying that Negroes "are bearing a disproportionate burden of the war in Viet Nam."

"Because of the inequities of the draft system, black men in this country are bearing the burden of an unjust war in Viet Nam," said the petition. "Therefore, we urge President Johnson to increase efforts presently being made to end the war in Viet Nam." Chester

Agreement Doesn't Stop School Boycott in Miss.

BY MERTIS RUBIN

HAZELHURST, Miss.--Negro parents here have rejected an agreement that would have ended the boycott of all-Negro Parrish High School.

Charles Evers, state NAACP field director, said the parents would settle for nothing less than the dismissal of Parrish principal A. J. Dillion, a Negro. "We want him O-U-T, out," Evers said last Wednesday. "That's all we'll accept."

Complaints about alleged misuse of money donated by the parents led to the boycott, which began March 15. Dillion said Wednesday that attendance at Parrish was "400 or less," while Evers put the figure at 72. There are more than 2,000 enrolled at the school.

Last Tuesday night, local leaders--including the Rev. Dudley Stewart, NAACP president--met with the Hazelhurst school board, and reached an agreement to end the boycott.

The board agreed that Dillion would have no further duties at Parrish for the rest of the year. The principal would have been given duties elsewhere in the school system, but his wife would have remained on the faculty at Parrish. Under the agreement, Negro parents were to present whatever proof they had of their complaints to the school board, "as soon as possible."

But the people would not accept this agreement. "The community felt that Dillion is so anti-civil rights, and hasn't done a thing for the Negro," Evers explained. "He's always helped the whites. . . . We don't want him at all."

City Schools Superintendent A. A. Roebuck said the school board wasn't trying to "protect" Dillion. "If anyone can prove that he violated the law or the professional code of ethics, the board wouldn't hesitate to do something," said Roebuck. "I don't think he should have his head cut off because of someone's spite."

Dillion said the people opposing him are "backward," and that they "fail to see the type of modern education" he has brought to Parrish.

He said some people were against him "because I don't attend NAACP meetings," and "because I haven't passed out freedom-of-choice forms."

But Someone Else Meets With CR Leaders

Vice-President Comes to B'ham

BIRMINGHAM -- "Welcome, Mr. Vice-President, to the Tragic City of Birmingham," said a picket sign.

About 70 picketers from the Alabama Christian Movement tried to see Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey at the Alabama National Guard airport here last Wednesday, to complain about recent killings by local police.

The people weren't able to talk to the Vice-President, who was here to address a Red Cross luncheon. But five Negro leaders did tell their complaints to Deputy U. S. Attorney General Roger Wilkins, in a private meeting.

Wilkins came to Birmingham to talk to the leaders Wednesday, after they had sent a telegram to Humphrey.

"Wilkins said he certainly understood the Birmingham situation, and that he would use his influence to see we get whatever relief we could possibly get," the Rev. F. L. Shuttlesworth reported after the meeting.

MONDAY IN BIRMINGHAM: MARCHING IN THE RAIN

To make sure there is no repeat of the fire that destroyed the church March 12, Smith said, the trailer will be guarded at night.

Two more churches have been burned in the county since the fire at the anti-poverty office. The Macedonia Baptist Church in Ft. Deposit, a Negro church, was burned on March 13, and last Saturday, the all-white Good Hope Presbyterian Church in Benton was destroyed.

Dr. W. L. Staggers, a white doctor involved in planning an anti-poverty medical program for Lowndes County, is a member of the Good Hope congregation.

Asked if there might be a connection between the latest fire and his involvement in a program that would aid many Negro residents, Staggers said, "I haven't heard anything about it."

Smith said this week that there were "very strong indications" that the headquarters fire was the work of "an organized group, who, for whatever reasons, destroyed a symbol of progress for Lowndes County."

TRAILER HOUSES ANTI-POVERTY HEADQUARTERS

The anti-poverty director said he decided to re-open on the site of the fire because "it was my determination that we do not run from a situation in which blind actions take precedence over prudent judgment."

He said a campaign has begun to raise $25,000 for the Lowndes County Community Fund. This fund will be used to build a new permanent office, and to help rebuild the church in Ft. Deposit. Smith said contributions can be sent to the Union Bank and Trust Co., P. O. Box 2191, Montgomery, Ala. 36103.

Already, he said, donations have come from church groups in Michigan, Connecticut, and West Virginia--and from white residents of Lowndes County. Coby C. Coleman, the white man who rented the old church to the anti-poverty program, has "offered to contribute a significant amount of money toward the rebuilding of the structure," Smith said.

In a statement issued last week, SNCC Chairman Stokely Carmichael said the church burnings and other recent events prove "that White America is tightening its noose around the necks of black people here, just as she is doing in Africa, Asia, and Latin America."

"Black people are now serving notice that we will fight back," he said. "The bombing of our churches and homes will only unify us more, and make us more detemined than ever to fight back."

Smith said he doubted that the fire at the white church was an instance of Lowndes Negroes "fighting back."

"It is the philosophy of the program to work with ALL the people in Lowndes County--to help Lowndes County," he said. "For this is a county program."

People in Lee Get Free Food

AUBURN -- The Auburn City Council this week agreed to share the cost of the surplus food program with the Opelika City Commission and the Lee County board of commissioners.

"The free food is on its way!" said James Roberts, one of the Negro leaders who organized a three-month effort to bring the federal program into Lee County. "All we have to do now is wait."

Probate Judge Ira H. Weissinger, chairman of the board of commissioners, said Roberts was right. "We're definitely going ahead with it," Weissinger promised.

"We've got to find a warehouse and work out storage and transportation," Weissinger said. "But our application will be on its way by the end of the month."

Losing Candidate Vows To Split Negro Votes

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY -- "I'm going to split every election that comes up," Mrs. Idessa Williams said bitterly after last Monday's Democratic primary election.

Hours earlier, the long-time Negro leader had learned that she finished third -- with barely more than 2,500 votes--in a three-way race for a seat on the City Democratic Executive Committee.

W. Paul Woolley Jr., a white moderate, won the Ward Two seat on the committee with nearly 11,000 votes. Nelson Malden, a Negro barber, was second with almost 4,000.

Mrs. Williams blamed her poor showing on the "college folks and high school folks" in the Negro community.

"Where were they when there wasn't but 422 Negroes registered at Hamner Hall (now a mostly-Negro precinct)?" she said. "The ones that worked are not going to stand by and let them take over."

She also blamed her political rival, Rufus A. Lewis of the Montgomery County Democratic Committee(MCDC). "Rufus will do anything to try and stop me," she said. "I'm not going to let him stop me, or anyone else."

Mrs. Williams said she would continue to work against Lewis and the college people, "until they consider one of us" for political office.

Although Mrs. Williams contended that Malden, an Alabama State College graduate, was Lewis' candidate, Lewis insisted that the MCDC screening committee hadn't endorsed anyone for the Ward Two seat.

He said the screening committee endorsed just two candidates for the Democratic executive committee -- Lewis himself for Ward Four, and Mrs. Norma Brewer, a white lady, for Ward 23. Both lost.

In the major Monday races, the MCDC --only group to make formal endorsements--supported all three of the present city commissioners for re-election. Mayor Earl James and Public Works Commissioner Cliff Evans won runaway victories, but the third incumbent, Police and Fire Commissioner L. B. Sullivan, lost to J. B. (Jack) Rucker in a close contest.

This was a turn-about from the 1963 primary, when the MCDC supported Rucker but Sullivan won the election. "I think there's an explanation," Lewis said, but he would not elaborate. "It would not be helpful to discuss it," he explained.

The screening committee's choices were circulated by "just getting around to the people" and by distributing marked ballots at the polls, Lewis said.

Despite the MCDC endorsement, Sullivan had an edge of less than 200--1,473 to 1,299, according to unofficial figures--at the Hamner Hall and Cleveland Ave. fire stations, the city's Negro strongholds.

Mrs. Williams said she voted for the third candidate for police and fire commissioner, C. C. Strane, while most of her friends voted for Rucker.

Private School Starting in Auburn

Entrance Pol[illegible] Not Decided

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

AUBURN -- A private elementary school will open here next September, one year after large-scale desegregation of the public schools.

The Lee County Educational Fund--sponsor of the school--mailed a fund-raising leaflet to white Auburn residents last month.

"Only the private school, we believe, now can provide an atmosphere free of pressures and other obstacles which make impossible the practice of (the) traditional American educational philosophy," the leaflet noted.

It also said that the school would be "dedicated to academic excellence" and would try to enroll "the more able children, as determined by nationally-used tests."

Some people thought those two state- [illegible] new school would [illegible] egation, and would [illegible] e students.

[illegible] Valder, associate director of the [illegible] Council on Human Relations, [illegible] has its state offices in Auburn, cited "past experience."

Alabama, he said, has many "'private schools' which in reality were formed with the sole intention of finding legal means of maintaining segregated schools."

"I think one would be justified in viewing this particular institution with some degree of skepticism--until such skepticism is proved to be unfounded," Valder said.

But Bernard Breyer, an Auburn University professor and president of the Lee County Educational Fund, said the new school's board has not talked about admission standards yet.

"The policy has not been fully enough defined" for him to say whether qualified Negro students will be accepted, Breyer said. "This is not an issue I would feel justified in discussing," he added.

The main reason for founding the school was "to get as good a school as we can get," Breyer said. Were there other reasons, such as providing an escape from public-school desegregation?

"A lot of people had a lot of ideas in mind," Breyer replied. "I cannot speak for a whole board."

PICKWOOD ACADEMY BUILDING

Another Auburn University faculty member said that Breyer himself resigned from the university when the first Negro student was admitted under a court order 3 1/2 years ago.

Breyer--who rejoined the faculty last summer--said that was true. "But my letter of resignation made no mention of race," he added. "It made a good deal of mention of political interference with the academic process. I am opposed to the courts telling a university --or the public schools--what to do."

The private school, to be named Pickwood Academy, is now under construction on five acres of land along Shelton Mill Road, in a white residential section. The plans include eight classrooms for seven grades (kindergarten through sixth), and a playground, a tennis court, and a swimming pool.

Tuition will be $30 a month for the first child from each family, and $20 a month for his brothers and sisters.

Breyer said that "150 children is the most we could possibly take care of" the first year. Although most of those children would probably leave the Auburn schools to attend Pickwood Academy, City Schools Superintendent E. E. Gaither said he doesn't consider the private school a threat to the public school system.

"There's plenty of room for both of us," he said. "Desegregation is working out with no trouble at all. I don't think this will make any difference."

Negroes To Fight Move By Wallace

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY -- An SCLC education specialist said this week that Alabama Negroes will fight any Wallace Administration move to block state-wide school desegregation.

John Reynolds of Greensboro, an SCLC special assistant on education, said:

"If Lurleen (Wallace) stands in the schoolhouse door, I'm going to make it my personal business to stand in the door with her, to make sure black children get into the schools.

"If she calls out the National Guard, I'm going to call the SCLC staff back into Alabama.

"We will meet the violent force of Lurleen with the non-violent soul of black men."

Reynolds said his pledge had the backing of SCLC.

Governor Wallace was to make a televised address Thursday night, to outline her plan for defying last week's federal court order. Three federal judges have given the state until next September to desegregate the 99 school districts that are not already under court order.

"Negroes must have the determination to continue to try to put children in school," Reynolds said. He said he will soon call a meeting of the state's Negro leaders, "to organize for a massive turn-out in September."

Warming up for the governor's Thursday appearance, the state Legislature last Tuesday passed a resolution urging all Alabama congressmen to seek the removal of Harold Howe, the U. S. Commissioner of Education. Howe is responsible for drawing up and en-

More Confusion In Dahmer Case

BY GAIL FALK

PASCAGOULA, Miss.--A few minutes before midnight last Tuesday, 12 Jackson County jurors reported that they couldn't agree whether or not Travis Buckley, county attorney for Jasper County, was guilty of obstructing justice.

It was only one of several confusing developments last week involving central figures in the Vernon Dahmer civil rights case. Dahmer, an NAACP leader in Hattiesburg, died in January, 1966, after his home was fire-bombed.

STOKELY CARMICHAEL AT STILLMAN

'To Hell With Laws of U.S.'

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA--Stokely Carmichael came to Stillman College last Wednesday, and asked the students to question themselves, their college, the Viet Nam war, and the laws of the United States.

He told the students of the "beauty" of black people and their history, and of the ugliness and "violence" of America. He called the U. S. "a nation of murderers in Viet Nam," and "a nation of thieves. They stole us."

Carmichael quoted Negro abolitionist Frederick Douglass, who said that a slave will always be a slave if he obeys the laws of his master. "If you want to be free," the SNCC chairman said, "you've got to say 'To hell with the laws of the United States.'"

"This country has law and order, but it doesn't know a damn thing about justice," Carmichael told a gathering of more than 400 on Wednesday night.

The audience in the college auditorium clapped and cheered loudly at almost everything Carmichael said.

"They train you to be a hired killer. The Viet Cong has never called you a nigger," Carmichael told the draft-age students.

Negroes are 10% of the population, but they are 30% of the Army, he said: "That's black urban removal, and nothing else. White people tell you not to be violent, and send you to Viet Nam."

"Let's embalm the rest of the world. Let us create a life of humanity for ourselves," he said.

Carmichael had spent the day talking to students about Negro history, and telling them what he thinks is wrong with Stillman.

"You need a black school," he said in one class. He criticized Stillman for having too many white faculty members, and for having an educational system that taught black people about Booker T. Washington ("an Uncle Tom of the worst kind"), but not of Crispus Attucks ("the first American to die in the Revolutionary War") and Malcolm X ("the CIA killed Malcolm X").

"You don't know how much you're missing," he told another class in a very, very quiet voice. "Life's going on all around you, and you're dead."

"The pacifists who preached nonviolence and love and all that junk--it is junk--came to preach where?" Carmichael asked. "The South," shouted the students. "To whom?" he asked. "Black people," they answered. "Who needed it?" came the question. "White people," was the answer.

"If I slap you, what do you do?" said Carmichael in another exchange.

"Slap you back," answered the students.

"If I keep slapping you, what do you do?"

"Kill you."

"RIGHT!" shouted the SNCC leader.

"If you want to love, you get married," Carmichael said. "If you start a political movement, you go for power."

MFDP Loses

WASHINGTON, D. C.--The U. S. Supreme Court decided last Monday that there was nothing wrong with the way Mississippi's new congressional districts are drawn. The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) had challenged the new districts after they were drawn by the state legislature last year.

Before now, the MFDP's suit claimed, the heavily-Negro Delta had always been a single district with its own U. S. Representative. By splitting the Delta among four other districts, said the MFDP, the legislature had ruined chances for electing a Negro congressman anytime soon.

Under the plan that the Supreme Court refused to review, one of Mississippi's five congressional districts--the First--has a slight majority of Negroes. More whites than Negroes are registered in this district, however.

MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

ENTERPRISE--Ivory Lee Edwards was still in bed this week, recovering from head injuries he allegedly received at the hands of Enterprise police.

Enterprise Negroes were forming a citizens committee to do something about the incident. James T. Scott, a local leader, said the committee will "go down to the Chamber of Commerce and the City Council."

"There's some pretty nice white people here," he said. "They wouldn't go along if they knew what was happening."

Edwards, a Negro, was injured the night of March 18. Scott, who looked into the case as "an interested citizen," said someone called the police after Edwards had an argument with a lady friend.

Two white officers arrested Edwards as he drove away from the lady's house, Scott said, but Edwards "took off" when the policemen went to search his car.

At that, said Scott, one policeman tackled Edwards, and handcuffed him after a scuffle. By the time the second officer approached, said Scott, Edwards was bleeding from the mouth. Edwards spit blood in the direction of the second policeman.

Then, Scott continued, the second officer started beating Edwards--who was still handcuffed.

Willie Clarence McCray, a witness to fall to the ground, face first. When McCray asked the officers what was happening, he told Scott, they ordered him to "get away from here--this is police business."

Edwards was charged with resisting arrest.

Scott said he asked District Attorney Lewey Stephens Jr. and the FBI to look into the alleged beating. Stephens said this week that the case was "under investigation. . . . We're trying to find out exactly what happened." Police department officials could not be reached for comment.

"Negroes must have the determination to continue to try to put children in school," Reynolds said. He said he will soon call a meeting of the state's Negro leaders, "to organize for a massive turn-out in September."

Warming up for the governor's Thursday appearance, the state Legislature last Tuesday passed a resolution urging all Alabama congressmen to seek the removal of Harold Howe, the U. S. Commissioner of Education. Howe is responsible for drawing up and enforcing the federal school desegregation guidelines.

In the state Senate, the only law-maker to speak against the resolution was Tom Radney of Tallapoosa County. He said the Senate should "quit passing meaningless resolutions," and concentrate on state business. Radney said Senators Stewart O'Bannon Jr. of Lauderdale County and W. H. Lindsey of Choctaw County joined him in opposing the bill on a voice vote.

Then on Wednesday, school segregation in Alabama--and everywhere else--suffered another legal set-back. By an 8-4 vote, the Fifth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans, La., again said that public school boards have an "affirmative" duty to integrate. The full court upheld an earlier ruling that adopted the federal guidelines as the standard for all schools.

Hazelhurst Boycott Ends

HAZELHURST, Miss. -- The big school boycott is over in Hazelhurst, but the civil rights movement is here to stay.

The Rev. Dudley Stewart, head of the local NAACP, said Negro leaders and the Hazelhurst school board reached an agreement last Friday night, and the people accepted the agreement.

As a result, said Stewart, A. J. Dillion no longer holds any position with any Negro school in Copiah County.

Dillion, a Negro, was principal of all-Negro Parrish High School until last week. Complaints about his alleged misuse of money led to the boycott.

The people had rejected an earlier agreement, under which Dillion would have been removed from Parrish for the rest of the year, but would have had other duties in the school system.

Last Tuesday night, about 1,000 people attended a mass meeting here, to talk about other projects. They were told that 2,500 of the county's 7,000 eligible Negro voters had been registered--many of them during the NAACP's month-old registration drive. And they heard that Hazelhurst has had a Negro policeman for almost two weeks.

Theater Closed Since 1957 Boycott

Movies Will Return to Tuskegee

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE -- Until last month, the Macon Theater in downtown Tuskegee was just another one of the South's abandoned movie houses. If there had been a sign on the door, it might have said, "Closed by segregation."

But now the theater front has a new coat of blue and white paint, and workmen are busy fixing up the battered building.

"We hope to open May 1," said Julius C. Robinson, the man who bought the theater. "But we're planning complete renovation, and we don't know just how long it will take."

One of the first things the workmen will do is close off the theater's west entrance.

"That was the Negro side," explained Robinson. "The place was really two theaters, with two separate entrances--and a brick wall down the center."

"We can't hardly take the wall out," he said. "It's connected to the roof by steel beams. I think we'll just open up the one side and see how we get along."

When the Macon Theater was built, segregation in Alabama's public places was just as strong as the brick wall. But now the Civil Rights Act of 1964--and Tuskegee's own year-old "public accommodations" law--make segregated theaters illegal.

A lot of Southern movie houses went out of business in 1964, rather than obey the Civil Rights Act. But the Macon Theater wasn't one of them--it had already been closed for years. "The boycott closed it," said Robinson, "along with most of the businesses downtown."

The boycott he was talking about began in the fall of 1957. Negroes stopped shopping in white-owned stores after the Alabama legislature re-drew Tuskegee's city limits to keep out Negro voters. When the U. S. Supreme Court ruled in their favor, many Negroes started buying downtown again--but the movie theater never re-opened.

Some of Tuskegee's white people blamed the Negroes for making the town do without first-run movies, but Robinson said he doesn't see it that way.

"It was because of the attitude of the whites that the theater closed," he said. "The Negroes were always for it. There never were enough whites without the Negroes. The Negro side supported it."

Robinson, a county supervisor for Tuskegee Institute's adult education program, made a survey of movie-goers before he bought the theater.

"To me, there's always been a need for it," he said. "Now the potential audience has doubled. If we get one-fifth of the potential, that'll be more than we can handle. We'll only have 350 seats."

And he expects some of his customers to be white. "Might be about 5%," he predicted. "We do have a few whites patronizing Negro businesses now. If it's clean and comfortable, some white people will come."

Negro Deputy Charged in Bullock Killing

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

UNION SPRINGS--Willie James King and Richard Lee Harris were laughing at a joke as they left the Golden Horseshoe Club together early last Sunday morning.

As the two young Negro men started toward their car, the way was blocked by Bullock County's only Negro deputy sheriff, Tom "Preacher" Tolliver.

WILLIE JAMES KING

Suddenly a shot rang out, scattering the crowd in front of the night club. King fell to his knees. Bystanders heard him gasp, "Preacher, you done shot me."

A moment later, King, a 30-year-old construction worker, lay dead on the sand in a pool of blood.

"When Preacher got back, I told him, 'The boy is dead,'" Simpson said. Then he went to tell King's pretty young wife, Mozell, that she was a widow.

About six hours later, Mrs. King drove the 12 miles to Union Springs with H. O. Williams, a Bullock County Negro leader. They woke up Justice of the Peace E. O. Hickman, and Mrs. King swore out a warrant against Tolliver for the murder of her husband.

As soon as he could get his clothes on Sunday morning, Hickman said, "I took the warrant over to the sheriff personally. I wouldn't let anybody else take it."

Why wasn't Tolliver in jail? Reeves explained that "some white friends" had put up the $2,000 bond right after Tolliver was arrested.

Was Tolliver still acting as a deputy? "That would be up to the sheriff," said the district attorney. "They tell me this was an accident--Richard Lee (Harris) was resisting arrest, and in the scuffle Tolliver's gun went off and killed a bystander."

"It'll all come out before the grand jury in July," Reeves added. "That's what juries are for. There's two sides to every story."

But Bullock Conty's Negro leaders--and some of the people who saw the killing--weren't willing to wait.

"The first thing we've got to do," said Williams grimly, "is get that gun out of Preacher's hands." The Negro leaders called a mass meeting for late this week to decide what form their protest would take.

Meanwhile, King's friends pieced together the events surrounding his death. Harris remembered that he and King were "laughing and joking like always" when they left the Golden Horseshoe Club.

"Preacher was leaning up against his car," Harris said. "He called over, 'Cut out the goddamn mess.' I said, 'Why? We ain't did nothing.'"

"He said he had it in for me a long time ago," Harris recalled. "He come

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY--Sam Sistrunk of Ozark stood dejectedly in the Montgomery Post Office, minutes after he was released from service on the jury that had freed Harvey Conner.

"I know it wasn't right," said Sistrunk, the only Negro on the 12-man jury. He said he had tried to dispute the 11 white men who thought Conner was innocent, but he finally gave in.

"I tried to tell 'em," he said last Wednesday, "but you know how it is.... No matter what we do, God knows. He'll take care of it."

After a day and a half of testimony and about 100 minutes of deliberation, the federal-court jury had found Conner, a former Elmore County sheriff's deputy, not guilty of violating the civil rights of James Earl Motley.

Motley, a 27-year-old Negro from Wetumpka, died in the Elmore County jail last Nov. 20, about two hours after Conner arrested him.

Told of Poverty

BY PATRICIA JAMES

JACKSON, Miss. --"The whole county is poor," said Mrs. Unita Blackwell of Issaquena County. "We don't have a factory -- nothing but plantations. We have children who have never had a glass of milk."

Isn't there any kind of employment? asked U. S. Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York.

"No employment," answered Mrs. Blackwell. "We need more than Head Start. We need everything."

This was just one of the exchanges last Monday in the Heidelberg Hotel here, as five U. S. senators--Kennedy, Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania, George Murphy of California, Jacob Javits of New York, and Winston Prouty of Vermont--learned about poverty and the war against it.

The senators heard from community leaders, and from representatives of Mississippi anti-poverty agencies. They also heard from one of their own --U. S. Senator John Stennis of Mississippi.

Stennis recited some of his criticisms of the anti-poverty program, and of CDGM (the Child Development Group of Mississippi) in particular. "From my own investigation," he said, "I know that a large part of the poverty-program money has been misused, mismanaged, unaccounted for, and wasted."

Some of the CDGM workers are immoral beatniks, said Stennis, and "they use CDGM cars on weekends to go places when they are not even working on their job." Senators Kennedy and Javits both disagreed with him.

After Stennis was finished, a stream of witnesses testified that the poor people of Mississippi needed help badly.

Claude Ramsey, president of the Mississippi AFL-CIO labor union, said the anti-poverty program had made some mistakes, which should be corrected.

But he added, "I don't think Senator Stennis is fully aware of the problem in this state. I don't think he understands the magnitude of this."

Said Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer of Ruleville, "We want to have a chance of helping the poverty-stricken people in Sunflower County." She said many people in the county ate only grits, rice, and beans, day after day.

A white lady, Mrs. Ida Lemore of Jackson, testified "All I want to say ... is if people can help, we need it."

Many witnesses, including Miss Marian Wright of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, attacked the federal food stamp program, which has replaced free commodity foods in many areas. Dr. A. B. Britton, chairman of the Mississippi State Advisory Committee to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission, said the food stamps should be free.

Senator Clark said the law-makers should get the U. S. Department of Agriculture to "do something to feed these hungry people."

SENATOR KENNEDY (ABOVE), AUDIENCE (BELOW) AT POVERTY HEARING

Conner Freed

BY MICHAEL S. LOTTMAN

MONTGOMERY--Sam Sistrunk of Ozark stood dejectedly in the Montgomery Post Office, minutes after he was released from service on the jury that had freed Harvey Conner.

"I know it wasn't right," said Sistrunk, the only Negro on the 12-man jury. He said he had tried to dispute the 11 white men who thought Conner was innocent, but he finally gave in.

"I tried to tell 'em," he said last Wednesday, "but you know how it is.... No matter what we do, God knows. He'll take care of it."

After a day and a half of testimony and about 100 minutes of deliberation, the federal-court jury had found Conner, a former Elmore County sheriff's deputy, not guilty of violating the civil rights of James Earl Motley.

Motley, a 27-year-old Negro from Wetumpka, died in the Elmore County jail last Nov. 20, about two hours after Conner arrested him.

The federal government's case against Conner was built on the testimony of two witnesses--Reuben Clark, a Negro serving in the Air Force, and Perry C. Stacks, a white state trooper.

Clark said he was driving with Motley last Nov. 20, when Conner stopped their car at about 1:40 a.m. After Clark got out of the car, he said, he heard a voice telling the deputy, "You don't have anything to do with this. It happened in Montgomery County, not Elmore County."

The airman said Conner replied, "You telling me how to run my business?" and then the deputy "asked Motley out of the car."

Conner finally arrested Motley, Clark testified, but Motley refused to get into Conner's auto, even after the deputy fired a shot in his direction.

Motley went back in the car he was riding in, said Clark, but when two state troopers arrived, Motley got out quietly.

"That's when Sheriff Conner touched him on his right shoulder," Clark said. He said Conner asked, "Why didn't you get in (my) car when I told you to?"

"At the same time," Clark went on, "he was hitting him (Motley) up side the head." When Conner stopped striking Motley, the airman testified, Motley crumpled to the ground.

As two state troopers carried Motley back to Conner's car, Clark said, the deputy told them, "Don't get that blood on my seat."

Stacks, one of the state troopers who answered Conner's call for help that night, told virtually the same story.

He said Motley's hands were "at his sides" while Conner was striking him, and he testified that he smelled no alcohol on the victim's breath.

Conner gave a very different version of the night's events. He said that while he was looking at Clark's identification, Motley got out of the car and "came between us and pushed me back."

The deputy said Motley "staggered," and "his speech wasn't as good as it should have been."

When the troopers came, Conner said, Motley got out of the car again. Then, he said, Motley "stood up immediately and grabbed me in the collar."

"I asked him to turn me loose twice," Conner testified, and when Motley didn't, he hit him twice, until "some blood came." Conner said he stopped hitting Motley as soon as the victim let go, and Motley was still standing up at that time.

The defense also tried to show that Motley was fatally injured by falling and hitting his head on a fence-post at the jail, not by being struck with Conner's slapjack.

But Judge Frank M. Johnson reminded Conner's lawyers, "You gentlemen should not lose sight of the fact that this man (Conner) is not being charged with murder in this case." He meant the federal crime, if any, was violating Motley's rights, not causing his death.

The jurors apparently considered the case for just the amount of time it took to convince Sistrunk. The Ozark brick contractor said one of the white jurors offered "to sprinkle some white on me."

"I told him it wasn't a matter for foolishness," Sistrunk said. "I made him ashamed of himself."

New Negro Policeman in Opelika Promises, 'I Aim to Do My Best'

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

OPELIKA--"I'm going into it full heart and soul," said James Baker Jr., one of Opelika's first two full-time Negro policemen. "This is something I have thought about for a long time."

"As a law-abiding citizen, registered voter, Christian, and father of six children, I have felt that when and if the opportunity presented itself, I wanted to become a law-enforcement officer," Baker said.

Baker, 27, and John Pruitt, 34, will begin work as rookie police officers this Monday. City Police Chief William J. Trussell Jr. said they will have the same authority other policemen have.

"When I hired them," Trussell added, "I said we're not going to give you an inch, and we're not going to take an inch. You'll work all over town. Whether his skin is white, green, or red, if he's breaking the law, arrest him."

Baker, a 6'7" former high school basketball star, said he planned to do just that. "I figure it's a challenge, being one of the first Negroes," he said. "I aim to do my best."

"The hardest part is people getting used to it," Baker continued. "Some figure it will be a good idea, but some don't."

Chief Trussell and Opelika Mayor T. K. Davis Jr. are two people who have said they think hiring Negro policemen is a good idea. Davis said the new officers "will fill an important need in the community," and perform "a vital service."

"Of course, it's not unusual for a city to have colored policemen any more," Chief Trussell said, "but I feel like it's a step forward for the Opelika Police Department. These are two real good men."

Opelika's Negro leaders, who spent three years trying to convince the city to hire Negro policemen, agreed with Trussell. "It was a long time coming, but we're glad it's here," said one leader.

Pruitt is one of four Negroes who joined Opelika's police reserve last October, shortly after Negroes rioted at a Darden High School football game. Did the riot help persuade Opelika to desegregate its police force?

"I think it was mostly coincidence," the Negro leader said. "But that may have speeded things up a little."

Pruitt left a job as stockroom manager at the local F. W. Woolworth store to become a policeman. Baker formerly worked for the Alabama Gas Corporation.

For the first few weeks on their new job, both men will ride in patrol cars with experienced policemen. Later, they will handle their assignments alone.

Trussell said he doesn't expect any problems when the new officers answer police calls. "When a citizen is in trouble and calls for help from the police, he wants an officer in a hurry, regardless of color," the police chief said.

"We are confident these Negro officers will serve the people of Opelika capably and efficiently."

Natchez Jury Hears of Plot, Can't Decide

BY MERTIS RUBIN

NATCHEZ, Miss.--A jury of nine whites and three Negroes couldn't reach a decision this week in the case of James L. Jones, one of three white men charged with the murder of Ben Chester White, a Negro.

The jury had heard a statement saying that White was killed last June 10 as part of a plot to lure the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. to Natchez. Sheriff Odell Anders said Jones gave him the statement last July.

In the statement, Jones allegedly said that he and two other defendants in the case--Claude Fuller and Ernest Avants --drove out to White's house and hired him to help look for a lost dog.

Later in the evening, the statement said, they stopped on a bridge, where Fuller told the old Negro man, "All right, Pops, get out." The statement said about 17 rifle bullets were then pumped into White's body, and the victim was also shot in the head with a shotgun.

According to the statement, Fuller said he "had orders from higher up" that White "had to go." The shooting occurred during the Meredith march, after James Meredith had been shot and Dr. King came down to lead the protest.

In his statement, Jones allegedly said Fuller told him White was killed in order to get some attention away from the Meredith march. Fuller was quoted as saying the killing might "get ole Martin Luther down here, and then we can get him too."

It was not until the third day of Jones' trial that Circuit Court Judge James Torrey let the jury hear Jones' statements. Defense attorneys had objected that Jones did not have a lawyer when he made them.

According to jurors Monroe Fitzgerald and Melvin Witherspoon--both Negroes--the jury spent all the time voting 7 to 5 for a conviction. They said there was never a chance that all 12 would agree.

Constable Shoots Grenada Man

BY MERTIS RUBIN

GRENADA, Miss. -- Last Friday night, 29-year-old David Wheeler and three friends were driving from Tallahatchie County to Grenada, where they lived.

At about 10:30 p.m., said Earl Hines (Wheeler's brother-in-law, who was riding in the car), Constable Pat Lott stopped the men, and asked them "Where's the liquor?"

"We told him we didn't have no liquor," Hines recalled this week. "Then he searched the car....He asker the girl with us, did she have a knife. She said no. Then he took us to his car."

As they drove toward town in the constable's car, Hines said, Charlie Pigdons kept asking, "What are we being arrested for?" and Lott told him to "shut up."

"Just after we got inside the city limits," said Hines, "Dave (Wheeler) said, 'I haven't said a word since I've been in the car, have I?'" Then, said Hines, Wheeler called the constable by name.

"After he said that," Wheeler's brother-in-law continued, "(Lott) just reached out and grabbed him, and slowed down. Then Dave grabbed the keys from the car, and somehow the car door on the left side opened, and they both got out almost at the same time."

The constable's car rolled on and hit a telephone pole, Hines said: "And that's when I heard the first shot, and looked back and saw Dave down in the the streets. It looked like he was trying to get up, but then I saw him fall back."

WHEELER (HATLESS) WITH FAMILY

"They say there was a second shot but I didn't hear it, I guess because the girl was screaming so," Hines explained.

When Lott came back to the car, Hines remembers, the constable told Wheeler's companions, "Don't move. I'll shoot you too, if you try to get out of the car."

Hines says he was in a daze the rest of the night. All he knows is that he and the others were charged with public drunkenness--and that David Wheeler is dead.

The death of the young husband and father brought demands for action against the constable.

King Buried In Bullock County

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

UNION SPRINGS--Mrs. Mozell King wept openly at her husband's funeral. "I had a good man, y'all," she cried out. "He said, 'I'm gonna take care of you and your children.' But oh Lordy, now he's gone."

Mrs. King's husband, Willie James King, was shot to death two weeks ago by Tom "Preacher" Tolliver, Bullock County's only Negro deputy sheriff. Authorities said the deputy killed King by mistake while attempting to arrest another man.

Last Sunday, about 500 people tried to crowd into the New Mt. Pleasant Baptist Church in Thompson to show their sympathy for the dead man's family.

Just as the funeral service was about to begin, the wooden floor of the tiny frame church buckled beneath the mourners. Many of them ran outside.

But although the floor fell about two feet, it didn't give way, and the funeral went on.

During the service, several friends spoke highly of King. "He was a real fine young man," said Joseph Mims, a fellow member of Bethel Lodge #123 of the Masons. "He didn't come to every lodge meeting, but he never let more than two or three months go by."

The Rev. R. B. Johnson talked about King's violent death. "This thing goes back generations," he said. "A lot of us are responsible for what happened to this young man."

But at a mass meeting two days earlier, Bullock County's Negro leaders said it was time to be angry, as well as sad.

"This is just one of many such meetings that will be necessary unless we do something to prevent such a tragedy from happening again," said Rufus C. Huffman. "One of the worst disturbers of the peace is silence. When you are silent to things you know are wrong, you are responsible when they occur again."

Said H. O. Williams, who lost the election for sheriff last year by a few hundred votes: "Every one of you who voted for white people helped pull that trigger."

Williams called King's death a "legal lynching." Huffman said it was due to "the laxity of county officials in putting a gun into the hands of an individual whose conception of enforcing the law is to kill, and kill only one group of people--Negroes."

All 250 people at the mass meeting agreed on two demands--that Bullock County officials fire Tolliver as a deputy, and that "no other law enforcement officers be hired whose duties of enforcing the law (are) restricted to one segment of the population."

"If these demands are not met," the group's resolution said, "we will take whatever action necessary to remedy this situation of a dual standard of justice that exists in Bullock County."

Early this week, five Negro leaders carried the demands to a special meeting of the county commissioners. Afterward, Huffman said he was "rather pleased" with the response.

"They told us they have no legal authority to fire Tolliver--that's up to the sheriff," Huffman said. "But they promised to use their influence as individuals to correct the situation."

Huffman said he hoped the commissioners would move swiftly. "If there is no action within a few days, we will take it further," he pledged.

Meanwhile, he said, Bullock County Sheriff C. M. Blue Jr. has responded to the Negroes' demands with threats of more violence.

Last Saturday night, Huffman said, Blue, Blue's son (a special deputy), and Tolliver arrested a man for "cursing" at the Blueberry Hill Club near Midway.

Johnny Mack Mason, a witness to the arrest, said that when some people tried to protest, Sheriff Blue "jerked the plug of the Rockola from the wall, and turned

As Blue said that, Mason reported, all three law enforcement officers "stood with their hands on their guns."

Nobody protested further, and the arrested man, Elliott Pugh, was taken before Justice of the Peace L. L. Reeder and fined $27.50. "I wasn't cursing," Pugh said later, "but I guessed I'd better go along."

Tolliver, a deputy for about six months, has been wearing a badge marked "private watchman" and driving an old car with a damaged red light on top. But this week, said several Bullock County Negroes, he now has a deputy's star-shaped badge, a blue light like the other deputies', and a new car.

"It's just like giving him a reward," said Huffman. "They're saying, 'You killed one. Now you have the privilege to kill another.' Unless we stop this now, eventually they will say, 'Let's kill a lot of them.'"

People Protest the War in Viet Nam

HARLEM GROUP HEADS FOR DEMONSTRATION--STOKELY CARMICHAEL AT CENTER

Marches in Alabama

BY ROBIN REISIG
AND MARY ELLEN GALE

BIRMINGHAM--Kelly Ingram Park, heart and headquarters of civil rights activity in the past, was the starting point for another kind of protest last Saturday--Birmingham's "mobilization" against the war in Viet Nam.

While tens of thousands met to register protest in New York and San Francisco, about 60 people--including Miles College students and faculty members, representatives of other schools, ministers, and at least one civil rights worker--gathered in the park.

Wearing signs like "Wipe Out Poverty, Not People," "LBJ For Ex-President," and "To Hell With the War! Freedom at Home First," they marched through the downtown business section, and past the city hall and county courthouse.

Unlike the people who have been marching daily to protest killings by police, the anti-war marchers had to stop at traffic lights, because they had no parade or march permit.

"We asked and asked for a permit," said Bob Bailey, a Miles faculty member who organized the protest. "Then we tried to see the mayor. He sent word out there was an administrative difficulty."

Some people were going to march anyway and risk arrest, Bailey said, but then "the mayor's office called and said we didn't need a permit if we stopped at traffic lights."

Peace and civil rights protests met at one point, as the silent line of mourners protesting the killings crossed the silent line of peace marchers.

Most bystanders, Negro and white, just looked silently at the peace marchers. Some took the leaflets the marchers were handing out--and some didn't.

One shop-keeper, refusing a leaflet, said, "I think everybody (marching) should be machine-gunned myself." Why? "Because they're yellow."

"Every one of them ought to be put in a cow-pen," said a man wearing a picket sign himself. (His sign said he was on strike against the Continental Trailways busline, "for unfair wage practices.") Why did he think the marchers should be penned up? "For not being loyal to their country."

In the only violent incident of the day, one passer-by attacked a marcher--knocking off the demonstrator's glasses, tearing his sign, and grabbing his leaflets and throwing them in the gutter.

"If they won't fight, let them not live in our country," said the angry attacker. Some plain-clothes policemen quickly restrained him.

Within the march line itself, there was a counter-protest, favoring the war. Tom Murphy, a student from Florida, carried a sign saying "Bomb Hanoi--Win."

A Miles student in the march, Lawrence B. Williams, 19, said he was against the war "because killing is wrong."

"I would rather be killed than kill," said Williams. "I should be here in my own country straightening things out, instead of messing with my colored brothers in South Viet Nam."

Meanwhile at Tuskegee Institute, 32 demonstrators--many of them white faculty members--gathered for an anti-war vigil on the lawn by the student union.

Led by Benny James, president of the Student Government Association, the group marched silently around the fountain in the center of the lawn and then formed a circle on the grass.

After a few minutes, the peace demonstrators marched across the street

Peace, Rights Leaders Join

NEW YORK CITY--"I've never seen so many people!" said the pleased but slightly surprised peace marchers standing in Central Park last Saturday.

The marchers were watching people arrive to take part in their anti-war demonstration. The people came in all ages, colors and costumes. There were black slum dwellers, white students and teachers, Japanese-Americans, and even some Sioux Indians from a reservation in South Dakota.

Demonstrators were still pouring into the park shortly after noon, when the march leaders started walking toward the United Nations building, about 20 blocks away. The marchers streamed out of Central Park for three hours before it was empty.

They completely filled the plaza in front of the U. N., and all the side-streets leading into it. Estimates of the crowd ranged from 125,000 (by the New York police department) to 500,000 (by a radio station that supported the march).

The demonstration was by far the largest the country has seen against the war in Viet Nam. But it was also two more things. It was the first mass, public union of the civil rights and peace movements, and it was a loud protest that the Vietnamese war is killing the domestic wars against poverty and racial discrimination.

Some of the country's most prominent Negro leaders joined with the mostly-white peace groups to plan and promote the demonstration. The Rev. James Bevel, who was a top assistant to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. for many years, led the organizing committee for the march.

Bevel, King, SNCC chairman Stokely Carmichael, and CORE leader Floyd McKissick all spoke at the huge rally in front of the U. N.

'A Serious Mistake'

NEW YORK CITY -- The NAACP's board of directors said last week that it was a "serious tactical mistake" to combine the civil rights and peace movements.

The NAACP stand seemed to be a direct criticism of the civil rights leaders who took part in the anti-war rally here last Saturday.

This combination of the two movements, said the NAACP, "will serve the cause neither of civil rights nor of peace."

Report From the Front

WASHINGTON--U. S. Representative William L. Dickinson of Montgomery came back from South Viet Nam last week with a glowing report on America's fighting men.

"I had the opportunity to visit with over 75 servicemen from Alabama, and am presently in the process of getting in touch with members of their family and loved ones to deliver messages," Dickinson said in his newsletter this week.

"Their morale, to a man, is extremely high," the congressman continued. "As a matter of fact, they are more concerned about the reaction of the folks back home, for they do read our American newspapers.

"Each and every one knows why he is there and how important is the job to be done. It was hard to explain to them about the demonstrations and so-called 'peace movement' back here in the states."

That's what Dickinson said. But after he left Camp Carroll at the northern tip of South Viet Nam, some of the servicemen expressed their opinions a little differently. For a report on what the servicemen think about the war--and about visiting congressmen--see Page Four.

There Are Trials...

BY DAVID BREMER

TUSCALOOSA -- "He hit me on my face and knocked me against the wall, and I went to sleep," said Mrs. Fannie Lou Dew. "When I woke up against the wall, he was still beating me."

"I didn't hit Fannie Lou Dew anywhere," said Greene County Sheriff Bill Lee. (In a statement that was stricken from the court record, he added, "If I had hit her, when she went to the hospital she would have stayed there.")

It didn't take a federal-court jury very long to decide whom to believe in Mrs. Dew's $300,000 civil rights suit against Sheriff Lee. In 48 minutes, the 12 white men on the jury ruled in favor of the sheriff.

Mrs. Dew, a Negro civil rights leader in Greene County, had sued Lee for damages resulting from a beating she said he gave her last June 20.

She testified last Tuesday that she went to Sheriff Lee's home at about 10 p.m. that night with Mrs. Paul Bokulich. The purpose of the visit, she said, was to have the sheriff approve a bond for Paul Bokulich. Lee had arrested Bokulich earlier in the day.

When Lee came to the door, said Mrs. Dew, he started to curse, and ordered her off his property. "He said, 'Get away from here before I get a shot gun and blow your damn head off,'" Mrs. Dew testified.

She said that as she started to leave, she told Lee, "We're leaving, but we're not running." While her back was turned, she said, Lee came out, kicked her, and then knocked her against the wall.

Sheriff Lee, a former Green Bay Packers football player and professional wres[illegible] claimed that he used no more than reasonable force to put Mrs. Dew off his property when she refused to leave.

"I grabbed her with my left hand in back of her neck and led her to the steps," he said on the witness stand. "I did not use any undue force."

In his final argument to the jury, Lee's attorney, Perry Hubbard of Tuscaloosa, repeatedly referred to Mrs. Dew's civil rights activity. He asked the jurors to consider the question, "Was SCLC, whose candidate Bill Lee beat in the last election, trying to stir up trouble?"

Leslie W. Finch of Belleville, New Jersey, one of Mrs. Dew's lawyers, told the jurors that Mrs. Dew "is not making trouble. She is in a court of law, asking for her civil rights and her dignity as a human being."

SELMA--Stokely Carmichael and Joe Smitherman had another disagreement last Tuesday. It came as the SNCC chairman and the Selma mayor were telling a three-judge federal court how Carmichael came to be arrested for "inciting to riot" last Nov. 5.

When Smitherman drove downtown that day, he testified, "out-of-town agitators with big boots and (with) cameras strung around their necks were in my way....I made them get out of my way, because I would have run them over if they hadn't."

The mayor said that "Carmichael led a snake-dancing, hand-clapping group around City Hall" shortly before the arrest.

"If you were clapping your hands, and singing, and hollering 'Freedom!' in front of City Hall...and trying to provoke an incident, I think you'd be acting defiantly," said Smitherman.

Carmichael's attorney, Donald A. Jelinek, showed the mayor several photos taken Nov. 5 by SNCC photographers. They did not seem to show a "near-riot"--as Selma police have described the incident. Smitherman claimed the photos showed "lulls" in the action.

Smitherman said Carmichael lunged at him three times before the SNCC leader was arrested. The mayor quoted Carmichael as saying, "You've made a martyr out of me. You've played right into my hands."

When Carmichael took the witness stand, he said he was picketing City Hall alone, until the mayor and several police officers blocked his way. "I asked them why," he testified, "and...the mayor said, 'Arrest that son-of-a-bitch,' and they arrested me."

In his testimony Carmichael explained that SNCC was formed "because of the oppression of black people in this country." This drew a loud objection from Selma City Attorney McLean Pitts, as did Carmichael's claim that the political atmosphere in Dallas County is "most corrupt."

Carmichael and others are challenging Alabama's anti-riot law on the grounds that it is "too vague" and that it has a "chilling effect" on freedom of speech. Carmichael and SNCC field secretary William S. House were convicted under the law in a Selma court last December.

Clarence Williams, president of the Dallas County Independent Free Voters Organization, testified that the arrests --three days before the November election--put "the old fear back into the people."

For his appearance in court last Tuesday, Carmichael chose a green Malcolm X sweatshirt and blue jeans. House wore a gray suit, but another SNCC worker, Thomas Taylor, showed up in a black-and-orange Nigerian "diashiki."

Taylor--who was convicted in December of illegal parking and resisting arrest--testified Tuesday that he was beaten, clubbed, and kicked by police and firemen on the way to jail.

Selma Police Captain T. C. Pyron testified that Taylor came at him with a "stick." Taylor said he was holding a staff given to him by the high priest of his religion.

The judges--U. S. Circuit Judge John Godbold and U. S. District Judges Virgil Pittman and Daniel H. Thomas--said they would take the case under consideration, and issue a ruling later.

...But Sometimes, There Isn't a Trial

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--The Macon County Circuit Court meets next Monday. But it won't be hearing the case a lot of people have been waiting for--the case against Fletcher Henderson, a white store-owner.

Henderson was charged with assault with intent to murder last month. Law officers said Eddie Menefee, a Negro laborer, was shot in the mouth during a quarrel at Henderson's store. But Henderson isn't going to be tried on the charge.

The case died in the grand jury room last week, when Menefee failed to appear to testify against Henderson.

"I tried to find Menefee," said Macon County Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson this week. "But his mother said she didn't know where he was--he took off as soon as he got out of the hospital. I did my job. I don't know what else I could do."

Why did Menefee disappear? "My son was afraid," said Mrs. Eugenia Menefee at the family's home in rural Macon County.

Mrs. Menefee indicated that her son had misinterpreted the actions of the white and Negro civil rights workers who tried to persuade him to press his case. "He said too many people was bothering him," she explained. "He was so scared he left without even a bus ticket."

Sheriff Amerson, a Negro, said he wished Menefee had come to him for help, instead of running. "If he wasn't interested enough to stick around. . ." the sheriff said, finishing his sentence with a shrug. "He had the protection of the law."

Nobody accused Henderson of trying to scare Menefee away. And Henderson said this week that he hadn't seen Menefee or any member of the victim's family since the shooting.

"I spend all day workin'," Henderson said. "I ain't got time to go messin' around."

Is there any chance the case will be revived later? Amerson said he didn't think so. "He (Menefee) didn't show up, so that's the end of it," the sheriff said. "It would have been interesting to see what happened."

Henderson was the first white man charged with a crime against a Negro in Macon County in the last six months, and his was the first such case handled by Amerson.

A little more than a year ago, a federal court ordered Macon County officials to end racial discrimination in the selection of juries. The officials were directed to empty the jury box and re-fill it with the names of all qualified citizens, regardless of race.

Last fall, Macon County had its first all-Negro juries in modern times. But the only case in which a white man was charged with a crime against a Negro was moved out of the county.

That was the much-discussed murder case against Marvin L. Segrest, a white man accused of killing Samuel L. Younge Jr., a Negro student. An all-white jury in Lee County set Segrest free.

People were wondering if Henderson's case would be treated the same way. But now they'll never know.

Tuskegee Dean Says Violence Is 'Natural Reaction' to Injustice

BY MARY ELLEN GALE

TUSKEGEE--When a Negro student was killed by a white man in Tuskegee last year, said Richard A. Wasserstrom, "almost everyone agreed that the thing to do was to let the system work, let justice take its course."

And so, Wasserstrom said, 11 months later "a jury of 12 white Alabamians had no difficulty whatsoever in finding the defendant innocent on grounds of self-defense"--although the student had been shot in the back of the head.

The point is not "that a guilty man went unpunished," said Wasserstrom. The point is "the operation of institutionalized injustice--of a system which is well understood by all involved to be very different from what it purports to be."

And that, he said, is one of many reasons "why Negroes are entitled to opt out of the system, to call off all bets, and to say that, in their case at least, the price of public peace and order is just not worth paying."

Wasserstrom, dean of Tuskegee Institute's college of arts and sciences, told a bi-racial audience of about 40 people that he wasn't advocating violence.

"I am more concerned with pointing out why violence is such a natural reaction," he said, "and why the riots that do occur seem to me so much less serious than the conditions that bring them about."

Those conditions, he said, are a "factual racism"--"a double standard within our legal order and protected by it."

For instance, he said, the federal government has refused to enforce criminal laws in civil rights cases, although it vigorously prosecutes violators of other federal laws.

"The FBI has insisted that it is only an investigative agency," said Wasserstrom, a former Justice Department attorney. "Yet its agents clearly have (the) power to arrest" without a warrant. "A systematic and vicious kind of hypocrisy is at work."

Although voting registrars in the South "shamelessly ignored" court orders to register Negroes without discrimination, he said, "with but one doubtful exception, not a single registrar in a single county in a single state has been charged or convicted of contempt."

"What kind of legal order do we have," he asked, "that requires of little children that they walk to school through an angry mob--that to enjoy their constitutional rights, they must have a kind of valor very few of us adults could safely claim?"

Wasserstrom gave his talk for the first time last month at the University of Michigan. He repeated it last Monday to the local branch of the American Association of University Women.

After he finished, one questioner wanted to know whether there was any hope for improvement in the situation.

"I'm not a very good prophet," Wasserstrom replied. "But it seems to me it will either change by white society recognizing its flaws or by becoming bloodier."

Since violence flared up in Watts, he said, "there have been more changes (there) than in the 50 years before. The tragedy of America is that the riots work."

JUDGE JOHNSON'S MOTHER TALKS TO INVESTIGATORS

MONTGOMERY--The home of Mrs. Frank M. Johnson Sr., widowed mother of U. S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., was bombed last Tuesday night.

Judge Johnson was one of three judges who signed the recent order desegregating all the public schools in Alabama. In the past, he has issued many other desegregation orders.

Montgomery Fire Department officials said a bomb was either thrown or planted against Mrs. Johnson's two-story brick house. When it exploded at about 10:30 p.m. Tuesday, the blast could be heard in many areas of the city. No one was hurt in the explosion.

City, state, and federal officials investigating the bombing were joined by a special Army demolition team from Ft. Rucker.

Governor Lurleen Wallace--who has announced a plan to defy the state-wide desegregation order--offered a $5,400 reward for finding the "malicious and fiendish demons" responsible for the bombing.

The governor said "this is not the American way or the Alabama way to protest" court decisions.

Daylight-- No Saving

BY MERTIS RUBIN

MENDENHALL, Miss. -- Daylight saving time didn't save any time for most of the employees of the Universal Manufacturing plant here in Simpson County.

When all the employees showed up an hour early, they had to wait an hour before going to work.

"I thought after we set our clocks up, we would go at 3 o'clock instead of 4 (p.m.), and get off at 11 instead of 12," said Glasco Floyd, one of the many employees who came an hour early.

"But when I got to work at 3, I had to wait until 4 to start. But I wasn't the only one--almost all of the evening shift was there at 3. And they say that the morning shift came at 6 instead of 7."

It was a different situation at another factory near here, where workers on the 11 p.m.-7 a.m. shift got off an hour early. When daylight time went into effect the morning of April 30, the clocks were set ahead one hour, thus making 7 come an hour sooner.

So that shift put in just seven hours of work--thanks to daylight saving time. They'll pay it back this fall, though.

Choctaw County School Day: [illegible], Sticks, and Water Guns

BUTLER--"They're always shooting spit-balls and pins and steels and sticks, and they have water guns and skate water on you," said seven-year-old Miss Rozena Direno Nolan, describing her daily bus ride home from school.

"The big boys tell me we're going to die the last day of school. Sometimes they have their knives out to my face and say, 'This is what you're going to get killed with.'"

Miss Nolan's story is not unusual. It is the story of most of the Negro children integrating white schools in Choctaw County.

In the past two weeks, their parents have been making vigorous efforts to change things. First, they sent a letter to Schools Superintendent W. I. Wimberly, threatening to pull all Negro children out of the county schools if the Board of Education does not take disciplinary measures.

Then they met last Monday, as they have before, with Wimberly and Harold Owen, principal of Choctaw County High School.

Integration at Choctaw County Elementary School has been fairly peaceful, the parents say, but there is often no discipline at all on the buses or at the high school.

"When you walk down the hall," says Miss Vrita Harrison, 13, an eighth-grader at the high school, "they kick and run into you. If you tell the principal, he just says there's nothing he can do. I had one fight with a big white boy, and he beat me pretty bad. Last week I got hit in the stomach. It still hurts."

MISS ROZENA DIRENO NOLAN

"The big white boys always pick on our girls," said her mother. "They don't look on them as being girls. They don't look on them as being human."

Miss Verganell Thomas, a 13-year-old seventh-grader, said a white girl hit her with a baton "because I was looking at her and she told me not to, and I told her she was nothing to look at." Miss Thomas said a "nice" teacher, Mrs. Nina Shirley, broke up the fight, and took both girls to the principal's office.

"When she (Mrs. Shirley) came back down the hall from talking to the principal, she was crying," said Miss Thomas. "The principal told me I was wrong hitting the white girl back."

What is being done about these and other incidents?

arm when the group was attacked by a gang of white people outside the Crystal Cafe.

Allen Black of Florence, a representative of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, was also cut on the arm. Witnesses said Black, a Negro, narrowly escaped more serious injury. They said his coat was slashed directly over the heart.

The attack took place about 5 a.m. last Sunday morning, as Valder, his wife, Black, and Miss Winifred Green of the American Friends Service Committee left the restaurant.

A group of whites inside the restaurant had been mockingly singing "We Shall Overcome." When the integrated group emerged, white people outside began shouting "nigger-lover" and other insults, witnesses said.

The two women, both white, walked back to their hotel without incident. But Valder and Black--who had lagged behind after paying the check--were jumped from the rear while crossing the street.

Although the assailants reached Valder first, witnesses said, they seemed to be more interested in Black. At one point, five of them were on top of Black as he lay in the street.

Valder managed to get the tag number of one of the cars in which the assailants fled. According to police records, said Glasco Floyd, one of the many employees who came an hour early.

"But when I got to work at 3, I had to wait until 4 to start. But I wasn't the only one--almost all of the evening shift was there at 3. And they say that the morning shift came at 6 instead of 7."

It was a different situation at another factory near here, where workers on the 11 p.m.-7 a.m. shift got off an hour early. When daylight time went into effect the morning of April 30, the clocks were set ahead one hour, thus making 7 come an hour sooner.

So that shift put in just seven hours of work--thanks to daylight saving time. They'll pay it back this fall, though, when the clocks are set back an hour.

At a church service here, one of the members announced a civil rights meeting for the following Friday at 7 p.m. Another member wanted to know if that was old or new time. (Some people wondered if old time meant he still wasn't coming, and new time meant that he might.)

The people finally decided that there is no old time or new time. It's just daylight saving time--that's all!

Mississippians weren't the only ones confused. In one Alabama community on April 30, some people showed up for a 3 p.m. meeting at 3 p.m., while others came at 4. A few didn't make it until 5.

Louisville Negroes Stay Away From Derby--But What Now?

BY ELLEN LAKE

LOUISVILLE, Ky.--"Where do we go from here?" That's the question Louisville's civil rights leaders are asking themselves.

Up until this week, they had been able to frighten city officials by threatening to disrupt the Kentucky Derby, the horse race that brings tens of thousands of out-of-town visitors to Louisville each year.

Using the slogan "No housing, no Derby," the civil rights movement had hoped to get the city to pass an open-housing law like the one the Board of Aldermen defeated a month ago.

But the Derby was run without disturbance last Saturday. The open-housing backers deliberately avoided making trouble at the track. In fact, they didn't even go.

MARCH IN THE RAIN

Instead, while 2,500 National Guardsmen, state troopers, police, and private security guards ringed the race track, 140 open - housing demonstrators marched down Louisville's main shopping street, four miles away, in the rain.

City officials hadn't expected Derby Week to end so peacefully. The annual Derby parade was cancelled early last week because of the threat of demonstrations. Most of the parade floats had already been made, and about $300,000 went down the drain.

On May 2, five Negro teen-agers ran out in the middle of a horse race at Churchill Downs, where the Derby was scheduled later in the week. Just as the horses came thundering by, the youths jumped to safety.

That afternoon, another cancellation was announced--of the huge music show that draws 20,000 people each year.

As Derby Day approached, the civil rights celebrities started coming to town. Four hundred people crowded into churches to hear the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and comedian Dick Gregory.

But as the city braced for trouble, the civil rights leaders pulled a surprise. Early Saturday morning, only six hours before the big race, Dr. King announced that--as an act of good faith--the open-housing supporters would not disrupt the Derby.

He said that opponents of open housing had spread "false impressions" that a riot would result if the Derby was interrupted. "It was our desire to make it palpably clear that we are not interested in creating a riot," he said.

The decision not to disrupt the Derby won the praise of the local newspapers and community spokesmen.

But Negro teen-agers, who have been ducking the stones, eggs, and bottles thrown by white hecklers, didn't see it that way.

"I don't see any point in this downtown march," said one Negro youth. "I wanted to go to the Derby. I personally would have laid down in the track."

And with the Derby over for another year, Negro leaders were right back where they started, in terms of getting an open-housing law.

Before the Derby, city officials said they had discovered that Louisville already had open-housing laws. They referred to three existing laws--one state law and two city ordinances, all passed at different times during the past three years.

But lawyers for the open-housing movement were somewhat skeptical. They said the three laws leave lots of holes that can only be filled by action of the Board of Aldermen. Furthermore, they said, the laws don't cover the renting of property, only buying.

"They just want to get us past the Derby," one Louisville Negro said last week. "Then they'll tell us to go to hell."

hit her with a baton "because I was looking at her and she told me not to, and I told her she was nothing to look at." Miss Thomas said a "nice" teacher, Mrs. Nina Shirley, broke up the fight, and took both girls to the principal's office.

"When she (Mrs. Shirley) came back down the hall from talking to the principal, she was crying," said Miss Thomas. "The principal told me I was wrong hitting the white girl back."

What is being done about these and other incidents?

Mrs. Rosetta Nolan said the parents "decided not to turn out all the schools" because of the harm it would do the children's academic records. The parents say they can't bring their problems to the PTA, as they'd like to, because the PTA stopped meeting when the high school was integrated.

When Mrs. Nolan, Mrs. Nellie Steele, Mrs. Willie M. Ruffin, Mrs. L. I. Spears, and four other mothers went to see Wimberly and Owen this week, they said, they received no promises of adequate protection.

In the meeting, they said, a teacher accused them of getting $10 a day to send their children to white schools.

"I know you don't love us," Mrs. Nolan said she told the officials. "I'm not sending them (the children) here to be loved. As long as we're in the kitchen and we're nursing your children, you love us, but when we get where we can't do that, we aren't you-know-what."

But Miss Vrita Harrison, at least, recalls Monday's meeting with relish. When the Negro mothers came to the high school, she said, "the white girls all asked, all so scared, 'Oh, Vrita, are those ladies coming here to teach us?' I said, 'Yeah.'"

The white girls replied that their fathers would send them somewhere else for school next year, Miss Harrison recalled: "I said, 'I don't care. I'll be back here next year.'"

CR Workers Defy Draft In Jackson, Montgomery

BY BARBARA ANN FLOWERS AND MERTIS RUBIN

Two Negro civil rights workers took stands against the draft this week, with different results.

Johnny Jackson of Hayneville, a SNCC worker in Lowndes County, said he was "prepared to pay the consequences" when he came to the Army induction center in Montgomery last Wednesday.

But after a day of testing--and a ride downtown to see a doctor--Jackson went back to Lowndes County, free of any military obligation. "Mr. Jackson has been found ineligible," said an officer at the induction center.

Jackson had arrived at the center Wednesday morning in an "agbada"--a colorful robe. "I'm representing my mother country by wearing this," he explained.

He said he would refuse to serve because the draft "violates not only my civil rights, but also my rights to associate," because the U. S. is fighting a "racist" war in Viet Nam, and because "I am against war, period."

At the end of the day, when Jackson hopped into a car going back to Lowndes County, he leaned out the window and shouted, "Black power!"

Meanwhile, in Jackson, Miss., John Sumrall's story was turning out differently. On Wednesday, Sumrall refused to take the symbolic step forward that means induction into the armed forces.

Sumrall was allowed to go home to Quitman, Miss., and back to his job as a payroll officer for the Child Development Group of Mississippi (CDGM). But he faced possible criminal prosecution for refusing induction.

Last November, Sumrall filed a suit asking a federal court to block his induction, on four grounds:

1. He was drafted out of turn by his Selective Service board in Clarke County.

2. His criminal record--a "number" of civil rights arrests and "at least one" conviction--"would ordinarily disqualify him from induction."

3. It is "normal practice" not to induct anyone with criminal charges still pending against him. But the "personal intervention" of Colonel James L. Davis, Mississippi Selective Service director, got officials to drop three charges against Sumrall, so he could be drafted.

4. Negroes are "purposely and systematically excluded" from Mississippi's draft boards.

But two federal judges denied Sumrall's request, and he had to report for induction. Did he know his refusal meant he could face a possible penalty of five years in prison?

"It doesn't seem like I'll be having a good time, do it?" he said.

Birmingham Marchers Stop After Ten Weeks

BIRMINGHAM--After ten weeks and one day, the marches have ended in Birmingham.

The marches, organized by the Alabama Christian Movement and other civil rights groups, were part of a "period of mourning" for the 10 Negroes killed by Birmingham-area police in slightly more than a year.

Originally, the chief demand of the demonstrators was automatic grand-jury review of all killings by police officers. City and county officials never met this demand, and no one was ever arrested in connection with any of the killings.

But in a statement announcing the end of the demonstrations, the Rev. F. L. Shuttlesworth said they had been successful.

"During this ten-week period," he said, "both the city and the county have publicly published directives from their manuals that policemen are to be kind, courteous, and fair at all times, are never to use abusive language, and never use any more force than is absolutely necessary in making arrests.

"In fact, the sheriff's department went so far as to say that it abhorred the maiming or killing of anyone. This is farther than Birmingham has ever gone before."

Shuttlesworth, president of the Christian Movement, said the marches had produced some "significant" results:

"It is significant that during this period of mourning and marching, no Negro has been killed by officers of the law. It is also significant that people are reporting more courtesy and respect at the hands of law enforcement officers."

"Our marches having accomplished their purpose of informing the public, we now will turn our attention to economics and integration of schools," Shuttlesworth said. "These things will help to make Birmingham and America the land of the free and the home of the brave."

White Men Freed In Grenada Case

BY GAIL FALK

OXFORD, Miss.--Eight Grenada white men stood smiling by the door of the federal courtroom in Oxford last Tuesday night, and shook hands with the jurors who filed out.

The all-white jury had just turned in a not-guilty verdict for all eight men, freeing them of charges that they "obstructed," "impeded," or "interfered with" Negro children entering John Rundle High School and Lizzie Horn Elementary School under a court order last September.

During the seven-day trial had denied that Negro s beaten, clubbed, kicked, an outside the previously all-whi in Grenada.

Twelve-year-old Richard Sig example, was not even cross-examined after he told how his leg was broken as he left the school Sept. 12.

After white boys broke his leg by twisting it, Sigh said, "they told me, 'Nigger, run.' I said my leg is broke. . .but I got up on one leg and started hopping."

Up the street, Sigh said, he met several other groups of white men who kept telling him to run.

Sigh testified that he wore a cast on his leg until the end of January. He had to go to a school for the handicapped this spring.

"Whoever did that should be punished, and punished severely," declared defense attorney Murray Williams in his final argument several days later.

And defense lawyer Hugh Cunningham--law partner of former governor Ross Barnett--shook his head over the "torment and misery and pain" of Miss Emerald Cunningham, a polio victim. He called her "this little girl who had been beaten and kicked and mauled."

But the defendants--J. R. ("Red") Ayers, Donald Wayne Bain, Archie Larry Campbell, William Flanagin, Clyde Perry, Duke Reynolds, Jerome Shaw, and Robert ("Bilbo") Shields--told the jury that they were not the ones who did the beating and threatening described by the Negro children.

Campbell, 19, said he couldn't be guilty since he was home sleeping all day on Sept. 12.

Miss Dorothy Allen, 17, had picked out Campbell as the man who beat her and another Negro student, Poindexter Harbie, with a tree limb.

And Grenada police Captain W. C. Turner said he saw Campbell hit Richard Sigh "with something" outside the school. Turner said he arrested Campbell two days later, and saw two iron pipes in the defendant's car.

Asked why he had the pipes with him, Campbell answered, "It is protection if you need it."

Turner also told the jury he saw Bain kick Harbie in the face, and that Harbie's face was bleeding after that. Another Grenada policeman said the same thing.

But Bain said the policemen didn't tell what really happened. He said the Negro boy "fell down at my feet and grabbed at my breeches. . . when the boy grab-

Clarke Folks Say They Won't Let Slain Man 'Die in Vain'

BY ROBIN REISIG

JACKSON--Johnny McKenzie, 19, father of two, was shot to death by a policeman here last Friday.

McKenzie was unarmed, and had not been accused of committing a crime. 'He was shot after landing on top of a policeman in a brief fight.

The young Negro was in a group gathered at the "Nite Spot" here, when two Jackson policemen--and a third man, not in uniform--arrived, night sticks in hand. According to witnesses, the officers said they heard there had been a fight.

FRANK DEAN

The people in McKenzie's group told the officers they had just arrived and didn't know who, if anybody, had been fighting, recalled Jimmie Lee Jackson. Then, said Jackson, "the policeman--the one who did the shooting--said if he just started whupping Negroes' heads, he'd find the right one."

"Johnny (McKenzie) said, 'You better not hit me with that,'" Jackson said this week. "The policeman said, 'I will hit you.'"

Harry Puller went on, "Johnny said, 'Hit me then.' He hit him. That boy (McKenzie) grabbed him (the officer), and they fell on the ground. I heard two shots. Johnny said 'Oh,' and fell back over on the ground."

Within a few minutes, Puller said, he realized that "that boy's dead."

"We attempted to take him to the hospital," said Jackson, "but the other policeman drew the shotgun on us, and told us not to move him."

Other witnesses said McKenzie was holding, not hitting, the officer. They said the first shot was fired into the air by a white man in the policemen's car. The policeman under McKenzie then whipped his gun out and shot McKenzie, the witnesses said.

"Johnny said, 'Don't hit me no more. I don't want to hurt you.' That's when he shot him," said Willie G. Robinson.

"He didn't shoot to stop him. He shot to kill," cried McKenzie's 18-year-old widow, Mrs. Linda McKenzie, who is expecting their third child in September. "I think the one that did it should ought to be killed!"

Mrs. McKenzie was not alone in her anger. The shot that killed her husband shocked the Clarke County civil rights movement--dormant since 1965--back into life.

beating and threatening described by the Negro children.

Campbell, 19, said he couldn't be guilty since he was home sleeping all day on Sept. 12.

Miss Dorothy Allen, 17, had picked out Campbell as the man who beat her and another Negro student, Poindexter Harbie, with a tree limb.

And Grenada police Captain W. C. Turner said he saw Campbell hit Richard Sigh "with something" outside the school. Turner said he arrested Campbell two days later, and saw two iron pipes in the defendant's car.

Turner also told the jury he saw Bain kick Harbie in the face, and that Harbie's face was bleeding after that. Another Grenada policeman said the same thing.

But Bain said the policemen didn't tell what really happened. He said the Negro boy "fell down at my feet and grabbed at my breeches . . . when the boy grabbed my leg, I fell backward and my leg went up."

Several students identified Ayers, a justice of the peace, as the man who attacked them and their friends. Charles Alexander, 17, said the red-haired man hit him with a pistol about 8 a.m. on the walk leading to John Rundle High.

Ayers said he carried his son to the high school that morning, but claimed he had not gone on the school property before 11 a.m. However, J. M. Ainsworth, principal of the John Rundle School, told the jury he saw Ayers leave the school steps shortly after 8 a.m., passing Alexander along the walk.

The principal said he hadn't observed any incidents between the boy and the man.

Before sending the jurors out to consider the evidence, U. S. District Judge Claude Clayton reminded them that they had sworn they could try matters involving "relations between whites and Negroes" without prejudice.

Earlier, U. S. Attorney H. M. Ray had said, "If you believe . . . that these defendants are guilty, but still acquit them, you would simply be giving a license to all persons who would flout the law in the future."

After hearing the not-guilty verdict, Negro parents who had attended the trial drove home to Grenada. One of the Negro ladies wondered out loud, "I don't know if I ought to let my children go back down there next year."

Why Only 1 Negro On Simpson County Ballot?

BY MERTIS RUBIN

MENDENHALL, Miss.-- This election year, Simpson County has just one Negro candidate--George Logan for justice of the peace, district 1, post 2.

Why only one?

"I don't know whether it's fear or lack of funds," said I. H. Floyd, chairman of the local nominating committee. "In district 4, we felt like we could put a supervisor in the courthouse, but our two nominees changed their minds."

A member of the committee, R. T. Walker, explained, "One of the men said he had committed himself to run for board of education next year. The other one never did promise to run."

Negro candidates might be discouraged by the fact that Simpson County is mostly white. Of the county's 3,136 Negroes over 21, about 1,600 are registered to vote. On the other hand, most of the 9,232 whites over 21 are also registered.

For that reason, said a member of the Civic League of Simpson County. "I think Negroes should listen to the white candidates and see how they feel towards us, and if we agree that that candidate would be best for our people, then support him."

"We don't have as powerful a vote as in some counties, so we have to team up for one candidate," said the civic league member.

For example, she said, the present school superintendent, G. L. Tutor, is running for re-election against a white opponent. If a Negro candidate were also running, she said, "rather than have a Negro, whites who think Tutor shouldn't be re-elected will vote for him anyway."

There is a better chance of defeating Tutor without a Negro on the ballot, she said, and "I don't want Tutor back again."

The Rev. John Perkins, Logan's campaign manager, mentioned another problem for Negro candidates. "Campaigns cost money," he said, "and most of our people don't have that kind of money."

Something's Wrong With Greene Juries--Jelinek

BY ROBIN REISIG

BIRMINGHAM -- "There is one chance in ten million billion," said attorney Donald A. Jelinek, that the Greene County jury system could turn out the way it has.

Though jurors are supposed to be selected at random, he said, at least 89 white people have each sat on three or more juries in the past six years.

In a complicated federal suit attacking the Greene County jury system, Jelinek used these figures as evidence that Negroes have been discriminated against.

His chief witnesses were Mrs. Mary Yarborough, clerk of the county jury commission for 12 years, and Miss Kathleen Veit, a 23-year old researcher.

Jelinek said Mrs. Yarborough had "flagrantly violated at least three laws" in picking jurors. Miss Veit said she found in a survey that Mrs. Yarborough and the jury commissioners had overlooked about 1,200 Negroes eligible for the jury lists.

But the most famous witness never showed up, although two subpoenas were issued for him. That was former Governor George C. Wallace--who, according to the suit, kept Negroes from being members of the jury commission.

Last Tuesday, when the trial began, attorneys for the state said Wallace wasn't coming because he had never been served with the first subpoena.

Another subpoena was prepared, and the case was held over to Wednesday.

Judge Clarence W. Allgood objected to this, telling Jelinek, "You're not going to get anywhere with cross-examination of Governor Wallace. I can tell you that you'll be beating your head against a brick wall."

The next day, Wallace still wasn't there. Instead, a state attorney said the second subpoena didn't count either, because the deputy U. S. marshal who served it hadn't brought the witness fees and mileage fees required by law.

The suit was brought against the county by Paul M. Bokulich of Eutaw, a white civil rights worker and former Greene County SCLC project director. Last September, Judge H. H. Grooms stopped the grand jury from convening to consider grand larceny charges against Bokulich, until the jury case could be decided.

DONALD A. JELINEK

SNCC Chairman Rap Brown, later arrested in the same county on the same charges, has joined Bokulich in challenging the Greene jury system.

This week's hearing began with the testimony of the Rev. Percy McShan, Negro candidate for county tax assessor. McShan said 80 to 82--or 17%--of the 471 people on the August 1966 jury rolls were Negroes. The county is about 80% Negro.

"Have you ever compiled a list of all the eligible males over 21?" Jelinek asked Mrs. Yarborough when she came to the stand.

"There would be no way for me to get all the names, Negro or white," she replied.

Mrs. Yarborough said she doesn't know many Negroes in Greene County, and that she never attends church or social functions with them.

"Actually the reputations I know are mainly the reputations of those who've been in trouble," she said. People on jury lists are supposed to be of "high repute."

District Attorney Thomas H. Boggs then asked Mrs. Yarborough twice if she meets large numbers of Negroes "who are recipients of welfare and have illegitimate children." Judge John C. Godbold overruled him both times and warned, "Don't try it again."

Miss Veit said she had found 430 men and 815 women eligible to be jurors. Jelinek said the jury commission should add all those names to its jury lists.

Arrest in Rankin County Leads to Fatal Shooting

BY MERTIS RUBIN

FANNIN, Miss.--"How many more will they have to kill before we decide to protest?" Willie Ricks of SNCC asked a crowd of about 250 people last Tuesday night.

"We need to turn Rankin County out," added former SNCC chairman Stokely Carmichael. "Let's buy black."

And so the people decided to boycott white stores in Rankin County, to protest the death of 23-year-old Earnest Rodgers at the hands of a highway patrolman.

Rodgers was killed last Sunday morning, after the car he was driving was stopped by patrolman Wayne Tutor.

"We passed a highway man who had stopped Odell Taylor," said Roosevelt McCoy, Rodgers' companion. "Then Earnest pulled up to the stop sign and stopped nice and smooth, and took off real easy-like. After we crossed the paved road on to a dirt road, we heard a siren, and Earnest stopped in the sand bottom."

Tutor came up and asked the men if the officers they had just arrived and didn't know who, if anybody, had been fighting, recalled Jimmie Lee Jackson. Then, said Jackson, "the policeman--the one who did the shooting--said if he just started whupping Negroes' heads, he'd find the right one."

"Johnny (McKenzie) said, 'You better not hit me with that,'" Jackson said they had been drinking, McCoy said: "We told him a little bit."

Then, McCoy recalled this week, Tutor said he was going to give the men a ticket for "reckless driving and a bad muffler."

"Earnest asked him, 'Say, sir, why do you want to give me a ticket?'" McCoy said. "He told Earnest to shut up. Then he hit him with his flashlight, and knocked him up against me."

"When Earnest straightened up, he ran into him (Tutor). They went over into the bushes. Then after a while, I heard a shot," said McCoy.

"The highway man came back on the road holding a gun on me, and told me, 'I'll kill you, too.'"

Finally, said McCoy, "about 15 or 20 highway men came down there. Every one of them called us niggers. . . . One fellow had a flashlight, and he kept slapping it against his hand. I looked at him, and then looked off. He said, 'The only thing I hate, they didn't kill you, too. He was saving you for me.'"

Mrs. McKenzie was not alone in her anger. The shot that killed her husband shocked the Clarke County civil rights movement--dormant since 1965--back into life.

"The next policeman that patrols the Negro section, his face better be black," Clarke County NAACP President Frank Dean said Sunday evening.

As McKenzie's body lay in the next room of the Jackson Funeral Home, "with a wound burnt in it, the policeman so close he baked his skin, tore his heart apart, and tore a piece of lungs out you can pick it up," Dean promised: "As the Lord God liveth, I say to Johnny McKenzie I will avenge his death."

Other Negroes also stood to say they would "not let Johnny McKenzie die in vain."

Jerry Pogue of Mobile told the group he had called the FBI. But he added, to loud applause, "There has to be a time when Negroes take the law into their own hands and be the FBI too."

When Pogue suggested marching on City Hall right then, nearly a dozen people jumped up. Some headed forward to shake Pogue's hand, and some head-

OEO Money To Madison?

BY BOB DINWIDDIE

HUNTSVILLE -- People here are waiting to see what will happen to the People For People anti-poverty program for Huntsville and Madison County.

Governor Lurleen B. Wallace vetoed the program at the end of April, after Huntsville Mayor Glenn Hearn had also turned it down. But Sargent Shriver, director of the federal Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), can still over-ride the veto and fund the program.

A petition asking Shriver to do just that is being circulated in Huntsville.

People For People (PFP) is a four-part package--including a multi-purpose neighborhood center, a consumer-education program, a home-maker services program, and a program to organize, assist, and train domestic workers.

Mayor Hearn objected to just one of the four parts of the program--the proposal involving the Sisters of Concern Club (SOCC). SOCC was formed late in the summer of 1966 to improve the situation of Huntsville-area maids.

Of the $48,565 budget for PFP, only $3,500 was earmarked for SOCC. With this small grant, SOCC planned to establish training programs in communication, health, and home and family care.

But SOCC has other goals, too.

Black Women Employment Program

Equal employment for minorities is a principle issue in this nation today. The plight of black women is particularly acute. There are few black females in white collar jobs, with the exception of secretarial and clerical positions.

The Atlanta metropolitan area is no exception. Extensive research has indicated that black women with college training or equivalent employment experience have had difficulty in finding suitable opportunities. Many qualified women have had to leave Atlanta to find employment in spite of their expressed desire to remain in the city. At the same time, employers have found it difficult to locate qualified minority applicants.

In an effort to meet both needs, the Black Women Employment Program was formed by the Southern Regional Council to provide this personal employment service FREE OF CHARGE to employers and prospective employees.

The Southern Regional Council is a biracial organization devoted to the attainment of an equal and open society. It uses research, information, and action programs to assist the people of the South to face current problems so that social justice can be achieved for all peoples in the region. The council is non-partisan, non-denominational, and non-profit.

EARLY NOVEMBER, 1955, was a critical time in Dixie. The eyes of the South, and of the nation, were focused on a Mississippi Delta community, where Emmett Till, a visiting colored boy from Chicago, had allegedly been killed, and where two white men accused of kidnapping and murdering him had been exonerated by local juries.

On November 10, while emphatic advocates of white supremacy were still exchanging congratulations on the outcome of the Till case, the Southern Historical Association assembled in Memphis for its twenty-first annual meeting. Headquarters of the meeting was the Peabody Hotel which David Cohn once referred to as the Northern outpost of the Mississippi Delta. Over 500 persons, representing a total membership of about 2,000, most of them teachers of history in Southern colleges and universities, registered for the meeting.

The first general session, a dinner gathering arranged by the program committee and sponsored by Phi Alpha Theta, honorary historical fraternity, was an occasion that will be long remembered by those who were present. This session was an overwhelmingly Southern affair; yet it was unsegregated; the papers read were moderate in tone; and while all of the 500 persons who attended were not in accord with the liberal views expressed, the applause, according to observation of old-timers, exceeded that of any prior session in the history of the association.

The topic of the session was "The Segregation Decisions." The presiding officer was Professor Thomas D. Clark, native of Louisville, Mississippi, graduate of three Southern universities, and long-time head of the history department of the University of Kentucky. The toastmaster was Philip G. Davidson, President of the University of Louisville, who was born in Nebraska but who grew up in Mississippi, graduated from the University of Mississippi and whose career in teaching and administration has been exclusively Southern. The discussion leader was Weldon James of the Louisville Courier-Journal, a native and long-time resident of South Carolina.

Cecil Sims, who presented the first paper, is a native of Atlanta, a graduate of the Vanderbilt Law School and a distinguished lawyer of Nashville, Tennessee. Benjamin Mays, who followed Sims, was born in South Carolina and educated at Bates College and the University of Chicago; after outstanding service in various ministerial and educational positions he became president of Morehouse College in Atlanta in 1940, the position that he holds at the present time. In 1952 the Yale Divinity School chose Dr. Mays to inaugurate its Wright lecture series. The concluding paper was by William Faulkner, winner of the Nobel Prize in 1949, a Mississippian known throughout the world for his affectionate and creative identification with the American South.

The program committee had hoped to have various shades of opinion represented, including opposition to the segregation decisions. But known segregationists who were asked to participate declined the invitation.

Even so, the session was marked by considerable variety of approach and treatment. Sims' paper was a calm and judicious analysis of the segregation decisions by one steeped in legal methods and traditions. Mays' presentation was an impassioned commentary on the moral implications of segregation by one who had experienced its inequities; the eloquence and the force with which the speaker stated his views was evidenced by the fact that he was twice interrupted by vigorous applause—a phenomenon without precedent in the Association's history—and by the tremendous ovation that he received at the conclusion of his remarks. Faulkner's paper, which combined some of the qualities of the two that preceded, was the laconically phrased admonition of an artist thoroughly devoted to the South, profoundly disturbed that his native region was out of harmony with enlightened sentiment of the world in its racial attitudes and alarmed by the possible effect of those attitudes as the conflict between democratic and communist nations moves into the critical stage.

Faulkner's concern and the conditions which gave rise to it were of particular interest to students of Southern history who listened to his paper at Memphis. For they knew that a similar situation had existed a hundred years before when the South found itself in opposition to the majority sentiment of the Christian world in clinging to the institution of slavery. Southerners persisted in their views then, even to sacrificing their wealth and blood on the altar of war. Recent utterances and activities of the more vocal element of Dixie's population have tended to create the impression that Southerners of today are as deeply committed to segregation as were their forbears to slavery. But the Southern Historical Association's session on segregation last November suggests one important difference. In the 1850s, educators, ministers and writers were in the vanguard of slavery's champions. They drew up and helped to disseminate the philosophic justification of the "peculiar institution." They declared slavery a divinely approved system, beneficial both to the bondsmen and their masters. They urged fellow Southerners to resist to the limit any and all efforts to interfere with the South's chosen ways. And when war came they actively supported the Southern cause.

In the present controversy college and church leaders are, to say the least, not in the first ranks of the segregationists. Many of them are openly in opposition to those who advocate resistance to the Supreme Court's decision on the subject. This opposition may be in a measure silenced as segregationists become more determined and better organized. But it can hardly be eliminated. Deprived of the leadership of this influential group, and thwarted by the nationalizing tendencies deriving from the influence of rapid communication, corporate business, and the South's industrialization, segregationists are at a greater disadvantage than were their proslavery antecedents of a century ago; and some of them do not hesitate to admit in private conversation that all they can hope for is a postponement of the inevitable.

It is not meant to suggest that the papers comprising this pamphlet represent the views of the Southern Historical Association in any official way. For some members of the organization, as indicated above, hold opinions contrary to those herein expressed. The essays are published for the purpose of bringing to the attention of interested persons within and without the association a remarkable incident of the Memphis meeting and the views whose public expression on that occasion made it memorable. The vocal South—the South known to outsiders—is overwhelmingly segregationist. The session at Memphis revealed the existence of another and a liberal South—soft-spoken and restrained, but articulate and powerful—that is earnestly pledged to moderation and reason.

American Segregation and the World Crisis

By WILLIAM FAULKNER

FOR THE MOMENT and for the sake of the argument, let's say that, a white Southerner and maybe even any white American, I too curse the day when the first Negro was brought against his will to this country and sold into slavery. Because that doesn't matter now. To live anywhere in the world of A.D. 1955 and be against equality because of race or color, is like living in Alaska and being against snow.

Inside the last two years I have seen (a little of some, a good deal of others) Japan, the Philippines, Siam, India, Egypt, Italy, West Germany, England and Iceland. Of these countries, the only one I would say definitely will not be communist ten years from now, is England. And if these other countries do not remain free, then England will no longer endure as a free nation. And if all the rest of the world becomes communist, it will be the end of America too as we know it; we will be strangled into extinction by simple economic blockade since there will be no one anywhere anymore to sell our products to; we are already seeing that now in the problem of our cotton.

And the only reason all these countries are not communist already, is America, not just because of our material power, but because of the idea of individual human freedom and liberty and equality on which our nation was founded, and which our founding fathers postulated the name of America to mean. These countries are still free of communism simply because of that—that belief in individual liberty and equality and freedom—that one belief powerful enough to stalemate the idea of communism. We have no other weapon to fight communism with but this, since in diplomacy we are children to communist diplomats, and in production we will always lag behind them since under monolithic government all production can go to the aggrandizement of the State. But then, we don't need anything else, since that idea—that simple belief of man that he can be free—is the strongest force on earth; all we need to do is, use it.

Because it is glib and simple, we like to think of the world situation today as a precarious and explosive balance of two irreconciliable ideologies confronting each other; which precarious balance, once it totters, will drag the whole world into the abyss along with it. That's not so. Only one of the forces is an ideology, an idea. Because the second force is the simple fact of Man: the simple belief of individual man that he can and should and will be free. And if we who so far are still free, want to continue to be free, all of us who are still free had better confederate, and confederate fast, with all others who still have a choice to be free—confederate not as black people nor white people nor pink nor blue nor green people, but as people who still are free with all other people who still are free; confederate together and stick together too, if we want a world or even a part of a world in which individual man can be free, to continue to endure.

And we had better take in with us as many as we can get of the nonwhite peoples of the earth who are not completely free yet but who want to be and intend to be, before that other force which is opposed to individual freedom, befools and gets them. Time was when the nonwhite was content to—anyway, did—accept his instinct for freedom as an unrealizable dream. But not any more; the white man himself taught him different with that phase of his—the white man's—own culture which took the form of colonial expansion and exploitation based and morally condoned on the premise of inequality not because of individual incompetence, but of mass race or color. As a result of which, in only ten years, we have watched the nonwhite peoples expel, by bloody violence when necessary, the white man from all of the middle east and Asia which he once dominated. And into that vacuum has already begun to move that other and inimical power which people who believe in freedom are at war with—that power which says to the nonwhite man: "We don't offer you freedom because there is no such thing as freedom; your white overlords whom you just threw out have already proved that to you. But we offer you equality: at least equality in slavedom; if you are to be slaves, at least you can be slaves to your own color and race and religion."

We, the western white man who does believe that there exists an individual freedom above and beyond this mere equality of slavedom, must teach the nonwhite peoples this while there is yet a little time left. We, America, who are the strongest force opposing communism and monolithicism, must teach all other peoples, white and nonwhite, slave or (for a little while yet) still free. We, America, have the best chance to do this because we can do it here, at home, without needing to send costly freedom expeditions into alien and inimical places already convinced that there is no such thing as freedom and liberty and equality and peace for all people, or we would practice it at home.

The best chance and the easiest job, because our nonwhite minority is already on our side; we don't need to sell them on America and freedom because they are already sold; even when ignorant from inferior or no education, even despite the record and history of inequality, they still believe in our concepts of freedom and democracy.

That is what America has done for them in only three hundred years. Not to them: for them, because to our shame we have made little effort so far to teach them to be Americans, let alone to use their capacities to make of ourselves a stronger and more unified America: —the people who only three hundred years ago were eating rotten elephant and hippo meat in African rain-forests, who lived beside one of the biggest bodies of inland water on earth and never thought of a sail, who yearly had to move by whole villages and tribes from famine and pestilence and human enemies without once thinking of a wheel, yet in only three hundred years in America produced Ralph Bunche and George Washington Carver and Booker T. Washington, who have yet to produce a Fuchs or Rosenberg or Gold or Greenglass or Burgess or McLean or Hiss, and for every prominent communist or fellow-traveler like Robeson, there are a thousand white ones.

In am not convinced that the Negro wants integration in the sense that some of us claim to fear he does. I believe he is American enough to repudiate and deny by simple American instinct any stricture or regulation forbidding us to do something which in our opinion would be harmless if we did it, and which we probably would not want to do anyway. I think that what he wants is equality, and I believe that he too knows there is no such thing as equality per se, but only equality to: equal right and opportunity to make the best one can of one's life within one's capacity and capability, without fear of injustice or oppression or threat of violence. If we had given him this equal right to opportunity ninety or fifty or even ten years ago, there would have been no Supreme Court decision about how we run our schools.

It is our white man's shame that in our present southern economy, the Negro must not have economic equality; our double shame that we fear that giving him more social equality will jeopardize his present economic status; our triple shame that even then, to justify ourselves, we must becloud the issue with the purity of white blood; what a commentary that the one remaining place on earth where the white man can flee and have his blood protected and defended by law, is Africa—Africa: the source and origin of the people whose presence in America will have driven the white man to flee from defilement.

Soon now all of us—not just Southerners nor even just Americans, but all people who are still free and want to remain so—are going to have to make a choice. We will have to choose not beween color nor race nor religion nor between East and West either, but simply between being slaves and being free. And we will have to choose completely and for good; the time is already past now when we can choose a little of each, a little of both. We can choose a state of slavedom, and if we are powerful enough to be among the top two or three or ten, we can have a certain amount of license—until someone more powerful rises and has us machine-gunned against a cellar wall. But we cannot choose freedom established on a hierarchy of degrees of freedom, on a caste system of equality like military rank. We must be free not because we claim freedom, but because we practice it; our freedom must be buttressed by a homogeny equally and unchallengeably free, no matter what color they are, so that all the other inimical forces everywhere—systems political or religious or racial or national—will not just respect us because we practice freedom, they will fear us because we do.

[Editor's note—On December 1, Mr. Faulkner extended views expressed in his Memphis paper with the following statement]:

The question is no longer of white against black. It is no longer whether or not white blood shall remain pure, it is whether or not white people shall remain free.

We accept insult and contumely and the risk of violence because we will not sit quietly by and see our native land, the South, not just Mississippi but all the South, wreck and ruin itself twice in less than a hundred years, over the Negro question.

We speak now against the day when our Southern people who will resist to the last these inevitable changes in social relations, will, when they have been forced to accept what they at one time might have accepted with dignity and goodwill, will say, "Why didn't someone tell us this before? Tell us this in time?"

The Moral Aspects of Segregation

By BENJAMIN E. MAYS

WHENEVER a strong dominant group possesses all the power, political, educational, economic, and wields all the power; makes all the laws, municipal, state and federal, and administers all the laws; writes all constitutions, municipal, state and federal, and interprets these constitutions; collects and holds all the money, municipal, state, and federal and distributes all the money; determines all policies—governmental, business, political and educational; when that group plans and places heavy burdens, grievous to be borne, upon the backs of the weak, that act is immoral. If the strong group is a Christian group or a follower of Judaism both of which contend that God is creator, judge, impartial, just, universal, love and that man was created in God's image, the act is against God and man—thus immoral. If the strong group is atheistic, the act is against humanity —still immoral.

No group is wise enough, good enough, strong enough, to assume an omnipotent and omniscient role; no group is good enough, wise enough to restrict the mind, circumscribe the soul, and to limit the physical movements of another group. To do that is blasphemy. It is a usurpation of the role of God.

If the strong handicaps the weak on the grounds of race or color, it is all the more immoral because we penalize the group for conditions over which it has no control, for being what nature or nature's God made it. And that is tantamount to saying to God, "You made a mistake, God, when you didn't make all races white." If there were a law which said that an illiterate group had to be segregated, the segregated group could go to school and become literate. If there were a law which said that all peoples with incomes below $5,000 a year had to be segregated, the people under $5,000 a year could strive to rise above the $5,000 bracket. If there were a law which said that men and women who did not bathe had to be segregated, they could develop the habit of daily baths and remove the stigma.

If there were a law which said that all groups had to be Catholics, the Jews and Protestants could do something about it by joining the Catholic Church. But to segregate a man because his skin is brown or black, red or yellow, is to segregate a man for circumstances over which he has no control. And of all immoral acts, this is the most immoral.

So the May 17, 1954, Decision of the Supreme Court and all the decisions against segregation are attempts on the part of the judges involved to abolish a great wrong which the strong has deliberately placed upon the backs of the weak. It is an attempt on the part of federal and state judges to remove this stigma, this wrong through constitutional means, which is the democratic, American way.

I said a moment ago that if the strong deliberately picks out a weak racial group and places upon it heavy burdens that act is immoral. Let me try to analyze this burden, segregation, which has been imposed upon millions of Americans of color. There are at least three main reasons for legal segregation in the United States.

1. The first objective of segregation is to place a legal badge of inferiority upon the segregated, to brand him as unfit to move freely among other human beings. This badge says the segregated is mentally, morally, and socially unfit to move around as a free man.
2. The second objective of segregation is to set the segregated apart so that he can be treated as an inferior: in the courts, in recreation, in transportation, in politics, in government, in employment, in religion, in education, in hotels, in motels, restaurants and in every other area of American life. And all of this has been done without the consent of the segregated.
3. The third objective of legalized segregation follows from the first two. It is designed to make the segregated believe that he is inferior, that he is nobody and to make him accept willingly his inferior status in society. It is these conditions which the May 17, 1954, Decision of the Supreme Court and other federal decisions against segregation are designed to correct—to remove this immoral stigma that has been placed upon 16 million Negro Americans, and these are the reasons every thinking Negro wants the legal badge of segregation removed so that he might be able to walk the earth with dignity, as a man, and not cringe and kow-tow as a slave. He believes that this is his God-given right on the earth.

Segregation is immoral because it has inflicted a wound upon the soul of the segregated and so restricted his mind that millions of Negroes now alive will never be cured of the disease of inferiority. Many of them have come to feel and believe that they are inferior or that the cards are so stacked against them that it is useless for them to strive for the highest and the best. Segregate a race for ninety years, tell that race in books, in law, in courts, in education, in church and school, in employment, in transportation, in hotels and motels, in the government that it is inferior—it is bound to leave its damaging mark upon the souls and minds of the segregated. It is these conditions that the federal courts seek to change.

Any country that restricts the full development of any segment of society retards its own growth and development. The segregated produces less, and even the minds of the strong group are circumscribed because they are often afraid to pursue the whole truth and they spend too much time seeking ways and means of how to keep the segregated group in "its place." Segregation is immoral because it leads to injustice, brutality, and lynching on the part of the group that segregates. The segregated is somebody that can be pushed around as desired by the segregator. As a rule equal justice in the courts is almost impossible for a member of the segregated group if it involves a member of the group imposing segregation. The segregated has no rights that the segregator is bound to respect.

The chief sin of segregation is the distortion of human personality. It damages the soul of both the segregator and the segregated. It gives the segregated a feeling of inherent inferiority which is not based on facts, and it gives the segregator a feeling of superiority which is not based on facts. It is difficult to know who is damaged more—the segregated or the segregator.

It is false accusation to say that Negroes hail the May 17, 1954, Decision of the Supreme Court because they want to mingle socially with white people. Negroes want segregation abolished because they want the legal stigma of inferiority removed and because they do not believe that equality of educational opportunities can be completely achieved in a society where the law brands a group inferior. When a Negro rides in a Pullman unsegregated he does it not because he wants to ride with white people. He may or may not engage in conversations with a white person. He wants good accommodations. When he eats in an unsegregated diner on the train, he goes in because he is hungry and not because he wants to eat with white people. He goes to the diner not even to mingle with Negroes but to get something to eat. But as he eats and rides he wants no badge of inferiority pinned on his back. He wants to eat and ride with dignity. No Negro clothed in his right mind believes that his social status will be enhanced just because he associates with white people.

It is also a false accusation to say that Negroes are insisting that segregated schools must be abolished today or tomorrow, simultaneously all over the place. As far as I know, no Negro leader has ever advocated that, and they have not even said when desegregation is to be a finished job. They do say that the Supreme Court is the highest law of the land and we should respect that law. Negro leaders do say that each local community should bring together the racial groups in that community, calmly sit down and plan ways and means not how they can circumvent the decision but how they can implement it and plan together when and where they will start. They will be able to start sooner in some places than in others and move faster in some places than in others but begin the process in good faith and with good intent. To deliberately scheme, to deliberately plan through nefarious methods, through violence, boycott and threats to nullify the Decision of the highest law in the land is not only immoral but it encourages a disregard for all laws which we do not like.

We meet the moral issue again. To write into our constitutions things that we do not intend to carry out is an immoral act. I think I am right when I say that most of our states, certainly some of them, say in their constitutions "separate but equal." But you know as well as I do that on the whole the gulf of inequality in education widened with the years. There was no serious attempt nor desire in this country to provide Negroes with educational opportunities equal to those for whites. The great surge to equalize educational opportunities for Negroes did not begin until after 1935 when Murray won his suit to enter the law school of the University of Maryland. It is also clear that the millions poured into Negro education in the last 20 years were appropriated not so much because it was right but in an endeavor to maintain segregation.

We brought this situation upon ourselves. We here in the South have said all along that we believe in segregation but equal segregation. In 1896 in the Louisiana case, Plessy versus Ferguson, the United States Supreme Court confirmed the doctrine "separate but equal." But from 1896 to 1935 there was practically nothing done to make the separate equal. When Murray won his case in 1935, we knew we had to move toward equalization. Since 1935 many suits have been won.

It would have been a mighty fine thing if we had obeyed the Supreme Court in 1896 and equalized educational opportunities for Negroes. If we had done that the problem would have been solved because gradually the separate school system would have been abolished and we would have been saved from the agony and fear of this hour. We didn't obey the Supreme Court in 1896 and we do not want to obey it now.

Let me say again that the May 17, 1954, Decision of the Supreme Court is an effort to abolish a great evil through orderly processes. And we are morally obligated to implement the Decision or modify the federal constitution and say plainly that this constitution was meant for white people and not for Negroes and that the Declaration of Independence created mostly by the mind of the great southerner, Thomas Jefferson, was meant for white people and not Negroes. Tell the world honestly that we do not believe that part of the Declaration of Independence which says in essence that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

We are morally obligated to abolish legalized segregation in America or reinterpret the Christian Gospel, the Old and New Testaments, and make the Gospel say that the noble principles of Judaism and Christianity are not applicable to colored peoples and Negroes. Tell the world honestly and plainly that the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man cannot work where the colored races are involved. We are morally obligated to move toward implementing the Decision in the deep south or lose our moral leadership in the world. If we do not do it, we must play the role of hypocrisy, preaching one thing and doing another. This is the dilemma which faces our democracy.

The eyes of the world are upon us. One billion or more colored people in Asia and Africa are judging our democracy solely on the basis of how we treat Negroes. White Europe is watching us too. I shall never forget the day in Lucknow, India, when nine reporters from all over India questioned me for 90 minutes about how Negroes are treated in the United States. I shall remember to my dying day the event in 1937 when the principal of an untouchable school introduced me to his boys as an untouchable from the United States. At first it angered me. But on second thought I knew that he was right.

Though great progress has been made, for which I am grateful, I and my kind are still untouchables in many sections of the country. There are places where wealth, decency, culture, education, religion, and position will do no good if a Negro. None of these things can take away the mark of untouchability. And the world knows this.

Recently a group of colored students from Asia, Africa, the Middle East and South America were visiting an outstanding Southern town. All the colored people except those from Africa and Haiti could live in the downtown hotels. The Africans and the Haitians had to seek refuge on the campus of a Negro College. That incident was known to all the other colored students and it will be told many times in Europe, Asia, Africa—and it will not help us in our efforts to democratize the world.

Not long ago a Jew from South Africa and a man from India were guests of a Negro professor. He drove them for several days through the urban and rural sections of his state. The Negro, the host, a citizen of the United States, could not get food from the hotels and restaurants. His guests, one a Jew and the other an Indian, had to go in and buy food for him. The man who introduced me in India as an untouchable was right. The Negro is America's untouchable.

Two or three years ago a friend of mine was traveling in Germany. He met a German who had traveled widely in the United States. He told my friend that he hangs his head in shame every time he thinks of what his country did to the Jews—killing six millions of them. But he told my friend that after seeing what segregation has done to the soul of the Negro in the South, he has come to the conclusion that it is worse than what Hitler and his colleagues did to the Jews in Germany. He may be wrong but this is what he is telling the people in Germany.

Make no mistake—as this country could not exist half slave and half free, it cannot exist half segregated and half desegregated. The Supreme Court has given America an opportunity to achieve greatness in the area of moral and spiritual things just as it has already achieved greatness in military and industrial might and in material possessions. It is my belief that the South will accept the challenge of the Supreme Court and thus make America and the South safe for democracy.

If we lose this battle for freedom for 15 million Negroes we will lose it for 145 million whites and eventually we will lose it for the world. This is indeed a time for greatness.

The Segregation Decisions:
A Lawyer's View

By CECIL SIMS

THE STORM of denunciation in the South which followed the recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the Segregation Cases had an earlier historical counterpart in the abuse of the same tribunal by Northern newspapers in 1857, following the decision in the celebrated Dred Scott Case. In the earlier decision the New York Tribune reflected the sentiment of a substantial segment of Northern and Eastern public opinion when, only a few days after the Dred Scott decision, it said editorially:

> "The long trumpeted decision . . . having been held over from last year in order not too flagrantly to alarm and exasperate the Free States on the eve of an important Presidential election . . . is entitled to just so much moral weight as would be the judgment of the majority of those congregated in any Washington barroom. It is a dictum prescribed by the stump to the Bench."[1]

Sixty-five years later Charles Warren, the eminent biographer of the United States Supreme Court, made the following observation with reference to the public reaction in the North at the time of the Dred Scott decision:

> "The whirlwind of abuse which swept upon the Court, the loss of confidence theretofore entertained in it, and the ensuing damage to its reputation, were, however, in reality, due more largely to misunderstandings of the decision, and the falsehoods spread relative to Taney's opinion, than to the actual decision itself."

Today we have in the South a situation similar to that which existed in the North immediately after the Dred Scott decision. Denied the right of citizenship in the Dred Scott case, the Negro has now, by decree of the same Court, been granted equal protection of the law under the Fourteenth Amendment in attending public schools. The fury and the predictions of dire consequences heard in the North in 1857 are now echoed in the South, and once again the attack being made upon the Court arises from a gross misunderstanding of the actual holding of the Court as applied to the continuation of the traditional Southern dual system of public schools with separate facilities for white and Negro students.

The prevailing conception of school officials, public officers, and perhaps lawyers, generally, is that the Supreme Court in the Segregation Cases has ordered schools for Negroes abolished, and that Negro children and white children will be required to attend integrated schools in the same buildings. Leading newspapers and periodicals speak of the impending "integration" of our two school systems as if the opinion of the Court leaves no alternative other than consolidation. Yet nowhere in the opinion of the Court does the word "integration" appear except in one quotation taken by the Court from the opinion of the Supreme Court of Kansas in the Oliver Brown Case.

The violation of the Fourteenth Amendment found by the Court was the compulsory attendance of Negroes in separate schools solely because of race. The mandate of the Court went no further than to order the gradual elimination of this element of compulsion by the adoption in good faith of a plan which would permit but not require Negro children to attend the same schools as white children within proper geographical districts. These conclusions will appear from a single analysis of the language to be found in the two opinions of the Court.

The Segregation Cases involved situations arising in Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware, where Negro children had been denied admission to public schools under State Constitutions or laws requiring or permitting segregation according to race. In each of the cases the Court found that the Negro and white schools involved had been equalized, or were being equalized, with respect to buildings, curricula, qualifications, salaries of teachers, and other tangible factors.[2]

It will be recalled that the Court had previously in 1896, in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson,[3] announced the "separate but equal" doctrine, under which the Supreme Court for more than half a century had, in the face of repeated attacks, continued to validate the constitutionality of the compulsory segregation of the races in public schools.

The "separate but equal" doctrine approved by the Supreme Court in the Plessy case originated in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in 1848, in its decision in the case of Sarah C. Roberts vs. The City of Boston,[4] in which Charles Sumner, the abolitionist, filed suit on behalf of Sarah Roberts, a five-year-old Negro girl who was refused admission to the white Boston public school, seeking damages under a Massachusetts state statute which made it actionable to exclude any child unlawfully from a public school. Chief Justice Shaw, in the course of the opinion, said:

> "It is urged that this maintenance of separate schools tends to deepen and perpetuate the odious distinction of caste founded in a deep-rooted prejudice in public opinion. This prejudice, if it exists, is not created by law, and probably cannot be changed by law. Whether this distinction and prejudice, existing in the opinions and feelings of the community, would not be effectually fostered by compelling colored and white children to associate together in the same schools, may well be doubted; at all events, it is fair and proper question for the committee to consider and decide upon, having in view the best interest of classes of children placed under their superintendence, and we cannot say that their decision upon it is not founded on just grounds of reason and experience, and in the results of a discriminating and honest judgment."

But the federal Supreme Court has now wiped out nearly sixty years of adherence to the "separate but equal" doctrine in the recent Oliver Brown and related cases, Chief Justice Warren ending this long period of judicial conformity with three cryptic sentences. The learned Chief Justice said:

> "In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws."

The real basis of the Court's opinion was the effect which the required separation of Negroes of tender age had upon such children mentally. Said the Court:

> "To separate them from others of similar age and qualification solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone.

* * * *

"Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority. Any language in Plessy v. Ferguson contrary to this finding is rejected.

"We conclude that in the field of public education doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiff and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment."

The underlying thought implicit in the above language is that the feeling of inferiority results not from the actual attendance in a separate school, but from the legal requirement under which Negro children are compelled to attend a separate school. It would seem logical to conclude under the opinion of the Court that Negroes attending separate schools by choice, and not under compulsion, would be free of the detrimental effect of segregation sanctioned and required by law. A system of separate schools available to the races upon a basis of free choice would not fall within the constitutional prohibition.

In interpreting the meaning of the Supreme Court decision, it must always be borne in mind that the first opinion of the Court, rendered May 17, 1954, did not require integration of the two school systems, and went no further than to condemn the compulsory separation of the races solely because of color. It will be recalled that in its first opinion the Court propounded certain questions to the parties litigant, and invited responses from the Attorney Generals of the Southern States, preparatory to the drafting of the Court's decree and, at the Court's direction, the first question to be considered on the second argument was whether or not the Court should by its decree direct that Negro children should be admitted to "schools of their choice" within limits set by normal geographic districting.

In considering the question of whether or not the South may continue to operate its separate public school systems for the two races and, more particularly, whether or not the states and local school boards may adequately meet the Court's requirements by giving Negro children, or their parents as their natural guardians, the right to choose to enter, or not to enter, schools previously maintained as segregated schools for white students, as distinguished from the compulsory integration of both white and Negro students in the same public school facilities, the second opinion of the Supreme Court, rendered May 31, 1955, is most illuminating. In this second opinion the Court said:

> "Full implementation of these constitutional principles may require solution of varied local school problems. School authorities have the primary responsibility for elucidating, assessing, and solving these problems; courts will have to consider whether the action of school authorities constitutes good faith implementation of the governing constitutional principles."

The Court specifically directed that in fashioning and effectuating decrees the courts should be guided by equitable principles characterized by "a practical flexibility," the Chief Justice saying:

> "At stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools as soon as practicable on a non-discriminatory basis."

There is a vast difference between mandatory integration and admission on a non-discriminatory basis. After stating that courts must require "that the defendants make a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with our May 17, 1954 ruling," the Court also pointed out:

> "Once such a start has been made, the courts may find that additional time is necessary to carry out the ruling in an effective manner."

The ultimate goal was described by the Chief Justice in the following words:

> "To that end, the courts may consider problems related to administration, arising from the physical condition of the school plant, the school transportation system, personnel, revision of school districts and attendance areas into compact units to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a non-racial basis."

All of this was ordered by the Court to be accomplished "with all deliberate speed."

The practical problem now existing in the South is to determine whether or not there is a feasible plan of achieving a system of determining admission to the public schools on a non-racial basis which may be adopted in good faith and which may be accomplished with deliberate speed. Such a plan is not required to have as its ultimate goal the complete integration of the races in a single school system, provided the Negro's right to choose is preserved to him free from coercion.

Harry Ashmore, in his recently published volume The Negro and the Schools,[5] provides an interesting example of the "right to choose" plan in the school system of Evansville, Indiana.

Prior to 1949 segregation in the public schools in Indiana was legally permissible and it existed in practice in the city school system of Evansville. In 1949 the legislature of Indiana enacted a statute abolishing segregation in the public schools and fixed a statutory period of five years within which it was required to be accomplished. At that time Evansville had a population of 130,000 citizens, 6.6% being Negroes. Under the plan adopted by Evansville, Negro children entering the beginning grades were given the choice of attending either the white or the Negro schools within their respective districts. No pressure was exerted to force the Negroes in making their choice.

There were approximately 12,000 white children and 1,000 Negro children attending separate elementary schools, and 6,650 white and 350 Negro students in segregated high schools. During the first year, 18 Negroes elected to enter the white elementary schools. Only one Negro student enrolled in the white high school. During the first year the choice was restricted to the first grade in the elementary schools and to the beginning year in the junior and senior high schools. In each succeeding year the choice was extended an additional grade upward throughout the five-year plan.

Those Negro children who chose to enter the white schools during the first year were widely scattered throughout the classes and they were received without any noticeable animosity. During the third year there were 50 Negro children in the white schools, but this equaled only 4% of the Negro students actually in schools, the remaining 96% having voluntarily elected to attend separate Negro schools. At the end of the fifth year, which expired in 1954, 92½% of the Negro children had voluntarily continued in their own separate Negro schools. This choice system was so satisfactory to both races in Evansville that at the end of the five-year period no effort was made to change it.

Only a few weeks ago the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee, at Memphis, after hearing testimony in open court, entered a decree approving an over-all plan adopted by the Tennessee Board of Education applicable to Memphis State College and other like institutions which involved a graduated plan providing for the admission of Negro students at the graduate level during the first year, and then continuing downward through the college one year at a time until all years were covered.

The experience at Evansville, Indiana, and the plan evolved with court approval at Memphis State College, would seem to suggest a sensible approach to the solution of the problem within the requirements of the Supreme Court mandate short of complete integration. Such a plan in actual practice will test out the rather widely held belief that a large majority of the Negroes in the South would prefer to remain in their separate school systems provided equal facilities are furnished with competent and adequately compensated Negro teachers. At the same time, this so-called voluntary or choice basis will permit a limited non-segregated pattern to develop within the two systems on a scale which will involve a minimum of friction and at the same time furnish clinical experience beneficial to both Negroes and whites.

In a recent article published by the Journal of Public Law at the Emory University Law School, in Atlanta, Georgia, W. E. Gauerke, in discussing this non-segregated pattern resulting from the choice system, said:

> "Researchers have pointed out that such a school is believed by some Negroes to present a unique opportunity for the solution of racial problems and the development of a sounder psychological setting for the growth of the personality of the Negro child."[6]

In 1944 a comprehensive study of the Negro problem, sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation of New York, resulted in the publication of a large volume entitled An American Dilemma. This was an impartial study of the American Negro in the United States, undertaken by Gunnar Myrdal (to use his own words) "in a wholly objective and dispassionate way as a social phenomenon." Myrdal was a citizen and resident of Sweden who was selected to make the study because he was a social scientist from a foreign "non-imperialistic country, and with no background of domination of one race over another, who could approach this task with a fresh mind, uninfluenced by traditional attitudes or by earlier conclusions."

A condensation of An American Dilemma, by Professor Arnold Rose of Washington University at St. Louis, in dealing with Negro attitudes towards education, gives the following conclusion of Gunnar Myrdal:

[6]"The Supreme Court Decision and the Separation of Races for School Purposes"

> "Negroes are divided, too, on the issues of segregated schools. Insofar as segregation means discrimination and is a badge of Negro inferiority, they are against it, although many Southern Negroes would not take an open stand that would anger Southern Whites. Some Negroes, however, prefer the segregated school, even for the North, when the mixed school involves humiliation for Negro students and discrimination against Negro teachers. Other Negroes prefer the mixed schools at any cost, since for them it is a matter of principle or they believe it is a means of improving race relations."[7]

Desegregation will not necessarily result in the integration of the white and colored races in the public schools. Recently, in a public discussion of desegregation in the public schools in Michigan, Alvin Loving a Negro high school principal at River Rouge, Michigan, was quoted in the Chicago newspapers in an Associated Press dispatch as saying:

> "I taught at a high school in Detroit. When I went there it was about 70% white. Then it began to change, and this change involved integration.
> "The school population became more heavily Negro. As it did so, clubs became either white or Negro. School dances were no longer held. Activities such as dramatics, which involved a sort of social contact, virtually ended.
> "We were desegregated—Michigan schools have never been segregated, as a matter of fact—but we were not integrated."

If by desegregation one means the abandonment of the existing separate schools for Negroes and consolidation of the Negro school system into the white schools with compulsory attendance of both whites and Negroes in the same school, there is ample evidence that such consolidation will not actually accomplish the integration of the races. This is particularly true if it is against the will and desire of a substantial segment of both the white and the Negro races. While undoubtedly there are some Negro families who will under all circumstances insist upon the right of their children to attend a mixed school purely as a matter of principle, it is entirely possible that even the most zealous of the crusaders, once this right is not denied but its exercise becomes a matter of choice will make their choice of schools solely on what they consider to be to the best interest and welfare of their children.

Unless the South, through wise leadership, can work out a sound and practical plan generally acceptable to a majority of both races, such as the "choice" plan, we face a crisis not only in the field of public education but in the much larger field of general race relations. The answer does not lie in mere delay or subterfuge. It is true that a state does have the unqualified right to withdraw from the field of public education and to discontinue its financial support of elementary and secondary schools, normal schools, and its colleges and universities. It is obvious, however, that no state can afford to take such a step without at the same time providing a substitute method for continuing its present school systems, and it is equally obvious that no such substitute system could function without the aid of public funds.

It is my belief that the people of the Southern States will not permit the abandonment of their public school systems without reasonable assurance that the schools will continue to operate in some manner on a semi-public basis. Any so-called private school system devised in an effort to avoid the requirements of the segregation decisions supported by public funds in the form of grants or subsidies to parents of school children will be a transparent subterfuge and as such will be held subject to the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. Anyone holding a contrary opinion will do well to read the recent opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Terry v. Adams,[8] in which the Court held that private Anglo-Saxon clubs in Texas, which called themselves "Jaybird Associations," and which were organized to control the selection of nominees for county offices, violated the constitutional rights of Negroes who were excluded from membership even though these associations operated exclusively with private funds.

There is nothing in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Segregation Cases which indicates a desire to coerce or stampede the South into a hasty and perhaps unwise reconstruction of the present school systems in order to meet the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor was there anything novel or revolutionary in the Court holding that changing conditions, including changed psychological factors, would justify the Court in changing its interpretation of the meaning and scope of the Fourteenth Amendment so as to bring about a different construction of that provision of the Constitution from that given in 1896 in Plessy v. Ferguson. A new and different interpretation of a constitutional provision to meet a crisis in a democracy is nothing new in the field of constitutional law. For example, during the depression in the 1930s, Congress passed an act declaring a moratorium on the foreclosure of past due farm mortgages. Farm mortgages, including the right of foreclosure, are property protected by the Constitution of the United States. In upholding the constitutionality of the legislative moratorium which suspended the right of foreclosure on farm mortgages, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> "It is no answer to say that this public need was not apprehended a century ago, or to insist that what the provision of the Constitution meant to the vision of that day it must mean to the vision of our time. If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which their framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning—'We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding,' (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 317, 407, 4 L. Ed. 570, 601)—'a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently to be adapted to the various crisis of human affairs.' (Id., p. 415). When we are dealing with the words of the Constitution, said this Court in Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416, 433, 64 L. Ed. 641, 647, 40 S. Ct. 382, 11 A. L. R. 984, 'we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. . . . The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago.' "[9]

The opinion of the Supreme Court in the Segregation Cases came as a distinct shock to the South, and perhaps to the entire country, but it did not come without previous warnings. For years leaders in Southern education have pointed out that our continued failure to provide equal and adequate educational opportunities for the Negro in the South, particularly at the elementary and secondary school level, was building up storm clouds of resentment that might ultimately prove disastrous to our dual system of public education.

Howard W. Odum of the University of North Carolina, writing before the first decision of the Court, said:

> "For one, the cumulative neglect by the Southern States of Negro public schools, and the South's failure to live up to its obligations to provide equal facilities for the two races, have compounded educational deficits beyond the reasonable limits of tolerance within the framework of constitutional mandates, democratic fair play, and moral obligations."[10]

What is needed in the South now is a recognition of the fact that the agency set up by ourselves in our democracy to determine questions of this nature has unanimously rendered a decision which establishes with finality the illegality of compulsory segregation of the Negro in the public schools. Our problem now is to examine the scope of the decision, to accept it, and to provide a rational plan that will come within the mandate of the Court and, if possible, one that will not destroy the public school systems.

The Court has found that compulsory segregation in the public schools based solely on color violates the Fourteenth Amendment to our Constitution. The Court has not declared that separate schools for Negroes must be discontinued in order to correct the violation of constitutional rights. It has directed that the element of compulsion be removed.

It is to be assumed that if a gradual plan is devised in the South under which Negroes are given the right to attend mixed schools within proper geographical limitations if they choose to do so, but with the further right to elect to remain in existing Negro schools with competent Negro teachers and equal and adequate facilities, wisdom will in most cases control the decision and a pattern will be developed for the ultimate solution of the problem without the needless destruction of existing sound values in our public educational systems. We must remember that the forces which generate heat may, with intelligent handling, be used to provide light.

BETWEEN 1938 AND 1947 THREE MISSISSIPPI PROFESSORS, PERCY LEE Rainwater, John K. Bettersworth, and Vernon L. Wharton, published scholarly volumes which laid great stress on Mississippi's poverty-stricken leadership in secession, Civil War, and Reconstruction to 1890. It is quite likely that if these studies were put on the market today, their authors would be run out of the state.

The search for historical truth has become a casualty in embattled Mississippi where neither the governor nor the legislature, in their hot pursuit of interposition, indicates any awareness that Mississippians were Americans before they were Southerners or that Magnolia State politicians once stood firm against nullification and secession. The state's present-day exploiters of federal munificence, however, should applaud the cleverness of their ancestors in the 1850's who interpreted state rights as requiring the use of national power to destroy local self-government in the territories and to thwart Northern state nullification of the fugitive slave law.

The striking parallel between people and events of the 1850's and the 1950's reminds us that Mississippi has been on the defensive against inevitable social change for more than a century, and that for some years before the Civil War it had developed a closed society with an orthodoxy accepted by nearly everybody in the state. The all-pervading doctrine then and now has been white supremacy—whether achieved through slavery or segregation—rationalized by a professed adherence to state rights and bolstered by religious fundamentalism. In such a society a never ceasing propagation of the "true faith" must and has gone on relentlessly with a constantly reiterated demand for loyalty to the united front demanding that nonconformists be hushed, silenced with a vengeance, or in crisis situations driven from the community. Violence and the threat of violence have reinforced the presumption of unanimity.

By 1861 Mississippians had been thoroughly prepared for secession by their shortsighted politicians, their chauvinistic press, their political preachers, and their blind philosophers, all operating within the authoritarian society. Even to the present generation the people have been paying for and eulogizing their most unwise decision of all time. In fact the romanticism associated with the Old South, the glorification of the Confederacy, and the bitter remembrances of Reconstruction have played their witless and powerful role in preserving a social order based on neither fact nor reason. According to Citizens Council literature, Mississippi is now the innocent victim of a second vicious Reconstruction from which its stalwart citizenry, demonstrating ancestral courage, will emerge triumphant as it did in 1875.

One of today's little sophistries asserts that equality must be earned, can never be achieved by force or law. The forgotten truth is that between 1875 and 1890 inequality was effected by force and regularized by law. By the end of the century Negroes had long since learned that Mississippi freedom included neither political nor any other kind of equality. The caste system had once and apparently for all been substituted for slavery, the Negro was in his place, and the society was once more closed and sacrosanct.

No meaningful challenge to the caste system was possible in Mississippi in the first half of the twentieth century. In public life no white man, demagogue or patrician, proposed to do anything constructive about the Negro. Preferring corrupt and inefficient government to participation by the black man, the whites got a one-party system without competition between recognizable groups, with no continuity of existence even of factions, and no means of checking the wild-eyed—in sum, a series of Bilbonic plagues and Barnett blights. Whether The Man Bilbo was just the "slick little bastard" described by his admirers, or represented "nothing save passion, prejudice, and hatred," as claimed by Fred Sullens, is of small importance as compared with his career as symptomatic of the chaos and bankruptcy of Mississippi politics and its social order. In such a demoralized wasteland the sharp-eyed Snopeses have grasped their petty gains, to the greater glory of laissez faire, which ironically has in turn produced the much damned transfer of state functions to the federal government and a diminution of state sovereignty.

Today the totalitarian society of Mississippi imposes on all its people an obedience to an official orthodoxy almost identical with the proslavery philosophy—this in the teeth of the nearly universal dissipation of whatever intellectual sanction white supremacy had among the enlightened at the turn of this century. Every Mississippi politician not only denies the validity of the Fourteenth Amendment but in his heart hungers for the negative days of the Articles of Confederation. Governor Ross Barnett, whose personal constitution stops with the Tenth Amendment, is conveniently ignorant of the incompatibility of state rights and modern industrialization.

On the racial question, the Governor's views are now well known. "If we start off with the self-evident proposition," Barnett says, "that the whites and colored are different, we will not experience any difficulty in reaching the conclusion that they are not and never can be equal." It was his appointee to the Mississippi Supreme Court, Justice Tom Brady, who became for awhile the metaphysician of the master racists with the publication of the hastily written and scholastically barren Black Monday (1955). In turn this was outmoded by Race and Reason (1961) by Carleton Putnam, Roosevelt biographer and successful airline executive, become, by his own admission, expert theologian, psychologist, and anthropologist within a two-year period. To the enchantment of Mississippians, Putnam exposed the Franz Boas conspiracy which, he asserted, had held the scientific world in a climate of terror and fear of persecution for half a century. Mississippians did not read the book (they just sent it to their friends, as instructed by the Citizens Council), else they would have discovered that, even by Putnam's logic, the white race was already doomed inasmuch as more than half the country's Negroes lived in integrated situations. But who would argue with the new messiah? With a flourish of trumpets he was brought to Jackson on October 26, 1961 (proclaimed by the Governor as Race and Reason Day) and feted at a $25-a-plate dinner attended by five hundred patriots.

There was no Dickens to point out that there never had been another such day in Mississippi. It could, Barnett believed, "mark the turning point in the South's struggle to preserve the integrity of the white race." Putnam had indeed provided an Article of Faith that Mississippians could live by. Denouncing the "left-wing pseudo-scientists" for creating the fallacy that "has gained complete possession of the Northern and Western mind," he designated Mississippi as "the heartland of the struggle for racial integrity" and in his best Bryan manner exclaimed, "You don't crucify the South on a cross of equalitarian propaganda." Calling on the South to produce more Barnetts, Putnam identified equalitarianism with Communism and segregation with Christianity.

In one respect Putnam's racist argument was not anachronistic. At the very time when the Negro was in the lengthy process of becoming a civilized being, he appeared to be and demonstrably was a cultural inferior, carefully trained for that status by every controllable factor in his environment. Faulkner has the Mississippian say: "We got to make him a nigger first. He's got to admit he's a nigger." From birth to death the Negro was exposed to an irresistible pressure for deferential behavior, and when he failed to conform he was driven out or even killed. By and large he played the role of Sambo well, giving little indication of any hope or desire to share in the white man's privileges.

One of the privileges he has seldom had in Mississippi is that of voting. In the twentieth century never so much as 10 per cent and normally less than 5 per cent of the Negro voting population has been allowed to register. Governor Barnett has repeatedly asserted that Negroes in Mississippi just don't want to vote, that they could if they so desired. Since 1954, Mississippi law, Barnett to the contrary, has required the voter applicant to read and write and interpret any section of the state constitution and (since 1960) to be of good moral character and to have his name and address published in a local newspaper for two weeks. At the moment, a substantial Negro vote would embarrass any white candidate in Mississippi. But the future is also plain. As Senator Bilbo once reminded an organizer for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, "Son, when you can show me that you can control any sizable number of voters in Mississippi, I'll be the damnedest champion you've ever had."

Gradual improvement of white schools has until very recently been shared by the Negroes only to a remote degree. But, as James K. Vardaman had understood, any Negro education spelled the eventual doom of the caste system. There may have been rumblings before, but the summer of 1954 brought a shock from which Mississippi's Old Guard will never recover. Having checked with his retinue of Uncle Toms, Governor Hugh White called in a hundred Negroes to get their anticipated endorsement for "separate but equal" school facilities. But a few young Negro radicals arranged for a caucus the night before the big meeting and after a heated debate carried the timid along with them.

Speaker Walter Sillers opened the momentous conference. Governor White spoke of the amicable race relations of the past. As planned, when the preliminaries were over, Charlie Banks got the floor and argued for the abolition of segregation. Five or six others followed suit. A conservative Negro publisher made a last stand for the old regime but was roundly denounced by a woman delegate as being a classic example of the effects of segregation. In desperation, Sillers called on another known friend of the white man, the Reverend H. H. Humes. As he walked to the front of the room the old minister was the center of all attention. "Gentlemen," he told the Governor and his friends, "you all should not be mad at us. Those were nine white men that rendered that decision. Not one colored man had anything to do with it. The real trouble is that you have given us schools too long in which we could study the earth through the floor and the stars through the roof." At this point, Governor White, mumbling that you couldn't trust Negroes any more, called the meeting to an end. It was also the end of an era. "For the first time," one of the delegates later said, "I was really proud to be a Negro in Mississippi."

Yet in the years since 1954 the state's Negroes have made few gains. The Establishment is entrenched so strongly that without the help of external forces (channeled through the federal government) Mississippi Negro leadership is for the short run in a helpless position. For, with varying degrees of enthusiasm, the makers of the orthodoxy—the press, the pulpit, the politicians, the philosophers, and the patriots—have since the Brown decision rushed to the successful defense of their way of life.

Moderation is expressed in the daily newspapers of Greenville, Tupelo, and McComb, and in an occasional weekly; nevertheless, the Mississippi press as a whole mounts vigilant guard upon the closed society. Happy with what a news director of a Jackson television station called "their home grown version of news management," the Hederman family newspapers manipulate information with little regard for accuracy or integrity. Negro crime and immorality in the North, Negro complicity in Communism, even Negro support for Barnett are given the headlines day after day. Shotgun blasts fired into a Negro home become a NAACP plot, the assassination of Medgar Evers is turned into a sacrificial offering to rekindle racial unrest, Mississippi is victimized by hate peddlers jealous of the state's economic progress. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger makes a revealing historical comparison: "Never was Hitler, nor Mussolini, nor the Mikado, nor even Kaiser Wilhelm attacked so venomously" as Mississippi—which invariably represents the South, with the South always a solid and unfaltering unit. But this leading state newspaper will find it difficult to approach ever again the imagination of its most famous headline, inspired by the arrest of Byron de la Beckwith, scion of an old Delta family, born on the Pacific coast but who had lived in Mississippi for thirty-eight years: "CALIFORNIAN IS CHARGED WITH MURDER OF MEDGAR EVERS."

To such editors and their heavy-handed associates the Fifth Circuit Court becomes "the nine judicial baboons in New Orleans," President Kennedy "regards himself as a Jesus whose infinite wisdom represents mankind's only real hope of salvation," and Ross Barnett is twisted into a modern combination of David, Horatius, and Leonidas. Tougaloo College, a center of integrationist activity, is rechristened "Cancer College," with a new summer course in "Rapid Hate," and the slanderous Rebel Underground, having recommended the execution of the President of the United States, emerges as "an innocuous handbill." By March 1963, the Jackson Daily News adds up the "price tag" on the federal invasion of Mississippi as coming to $14 million because of 130 bonus accidental deaths on the state's highways attributed to "a frame of mind, an atmosphere of anger, a period of bayonet-point frustration" which lowered the morale of the highway patrol. For the University faculty members who had the temerity to treat James Meredith as a human being, editor Jimmy Ward predicts crushed spirits, bitterness, even self-imposed tragedy.

In times of trial the Jackson papers lose all semblance of perspective. For example, on the day that Judge Sidney Mize ordered Meredith enrolled in the University, the Daily News front page carried these headlines:

Editor's Column: All Loyal Mississippians
Support Him [Barnett]

There was still room for a small cartoon about a Mississippi College football game and the index.

The role of the church since 1954 is more difficult to assess than is that of the press. Some churches have taken exceptional action, notably the Mississippi diocese of the Episcopal Church which issued a general call for support of the Supreme Court's decision and eventual integration. And in the past year many preachers and a few ministerial groups have made courageous stands. But the church as a whole has remained loyal to the status quo. Ministers who led the discussion about segregation were for it, prompted no doubt by "an echo from the pew." In annual session, the Mississippi Baptist convention refused to endorse a series of resolutions reaffirming "our intelligent good will toward all men" and calling upon Christians to pray "that we may live consistent with Christian citizenship." A Baptist missionary, second cousin of Governor Barnett, wrote from Nigeria that Mississippians were making her work extremely difficult: "You send us out here to preach that Christ died for all men. Then you make a travesty of our message by refusing to associate with some of them because of the color of their skin. You are supposed to be holding the lifelines for us, and you are twisting them into a noose of racism to strangle our message. Communists do not need to work against the preaching of the Gospel here; you are doing it quite adequately." The missionary's mother expressed regret: "Antonina doesn't understand that Ross has been doing the best he can."

Other groups in Mississippi society, supporters of the orthodoxy, hold a position comparable to their predecessors of the Civil War period. The conservative men of large property holdings considered secession a doubtful though perfectly legal remedy for their troubles; it was a much larger group of active, restless lawyer-politicians, petty planters, and small-town editors, successful enterprisers on the make, who took Mississippi out of the Union in 1861. After World War II another crowd of "new men," bold entrepreneurs enamored as their forefathers had been of the prevailing social order, too busy making money to think deeply about changes bound to accompany progress, pleased with the "right-to-work" principle embedded in the constitution and with a colossal program of state socialism to entice the Yankee carpetbagger industrialist, sat by quietly and acquiesced in the building of the Citizens Council juggernaut.

Constitutional questions, on which so much controversy has centered since 1954, continue to bring a response in keeping with the quality of Mississippi leadership. There seems to be some confusion in the minds of the state's lawyers and jurists as to whether Mississippians must obey the law of the land as interpreted by the federal courts. Dean Robert J. Farley of the Ole Miss law school repeatedly warned in public that lawyers were acting irresponsibly in permitting by their silence the Citizens Council and irreconcilable politicians to interpret the law for them. The chief dereliction, it seems clear, came in allowing the people of Mississippi to believe that they could get away with an outright defiance of the courts. "We as Mississippians," declared Justice Brady in 1959, "will not bow down to a court of nine old men whose hearts are as black as their robes." Brady castigated Governor Coleman, who had frowned upon interposition as so much "legal poppycock," as a moderate—"a man who is going to let a little sewage under the door." But the classic statement regarding law and order came in 1963 from the very top of Mount Olympus. Indignant over the "sickening" conduct of Negro parents and ministers in Birmingham in permitting boys and girls to run "afoul" of the law by "using these children for ignoble and loathesome ends and deliberately and contemptuously inciting them to become juvenile delinquents," Governor Barnett declared in a burst of emotion: "What do these degenerates know of freedom? True freedom consists of and is founded upon the observance of law and the power of law to make those who would break the law conform to it. History tells us that freedom can exist only under the protection of constitutional law. These agitators seek to defy constitutional law under the name of freedom." Once again Ross was doing the best he could.

The new legislature convening in January 1962 was met by a request from the Governor to (1) outlaw the Communist party (years before, the FBI had found one Communist in Mississippi), (2) pass "an enforceable sedition act," and (3) compel state employees to take an oath of allegiance to the United States and Mississippi. (Barnett did not explain whether this could be accomplished in a single oath.) In any event, when Mississippi legislators get together their herd instinct drives them to resolving the fate of the world. If they hate Hodding Carter or the President of the United States, or love Elvis Presley, Dizzy Dean, the Mississippi State basketball team, or South Africa, or feel that a former Miss America is an accomplished actress, they are not inhibited from saying so. Senator Hugh Bailey, who had ridden a bull from Canton to Jackson to fulfill a campaign promise, offered a resolution urging the United States to substitute turnip seed for cash in the foreign aid program. Such action, he asserted, "would relieve pressure in this country's economy and give the world's population necessary vitamins, minerals, and bulk." A mere handful of the seed would feed a hundred people and could be mailed overseas for planting.

Legislators spend much of their time devising legal subterfuges to keep the Negro in his place. When it appeared that the number of "smart alecks" telephoning "white ladies" had reached "epidemic stages," the House voted a $10,000 fine and five years imprisonment for cursing into the telephone. Objection to such stiff punishment brought the assurance that judges would know how to use the law. The House unanimously called for a constitutional amendment barring from voting persons guilty of vagrancy, perjury, and child desertion, and concurred in the addition of adultery, fornication, larceny, gambling, and crimes committed with a deadly weapon. A still further addition of habitual drunkenness was defeated when a member suggested that it "might even get some of us." There was some objection, also, to the inclusion of adultery. Reprisal legislation is common, like that bill which the committee chairman said was "concerned with a woman editor who has been writing things which don't go along with the feelings in the community" or another condemning land belonging to Campbell College after Representative McClellan explained, "Jackson has had a cancer in its midst long enough." The cancer will be removed to Mound Bayou in 1964.

One legislator was sorely impressed with the power of the Citizens Council:

> It's hard for us sometimes to consider a bill on its merits if there is any way Bill Simmons [executive secretary of the Citizens Council] can attach an integration tag. For instance, a resolution was introduced in the House to urge a boycott of Memphis stores because some of them have desegregated. I knew it was ridiculous and would merely amuse North Mississippians who habitually shop in Memphis. The resolution came in the same week that four Negroes were fined in court for boycotting Clarksdale stores. Yet the hot eyes of Bill Simmons were watching. If we had voted against the resolution he would have branded us. So there we were, approving a boycott while a Mississippi court was convicting Negroes for doing what we lawmakers were advocating. It just didn't make sense.

As is characteristic of a closed society, the schools, too, are pressured by organized voices of the orthodoxy: the Citizens Council, the American Legion, and the patriotic ladies' groups. A case in point was the withdrawal of a film called "The High Wall," donated to the state by the Anti-Defamation League and shown in Mississippi schools for more than six years. The Citizens Council interpreted the film as teaching "children to pity their prejudiced parents who did not enjoy the enriching experience of intermingling with persons of different racial, ethnic and cultural backgrounds." At the end of the film the Council was saddened to find "Americans and Poles walk arm-in-arm into the setting sun." An "alert state senator" sounded the alarm, a private exhibition was given for Council and Mississippi Sovereignty Commission officials who agreed "The High Wall" was "unfit for showing to Mississippi school children," and the menace was removed.

The state Daughters of the American Revolution have time and again gone directly to the legislature, predictably with the encouragement of the Governor who comes down hard for cleaning up the books "so that children can be truly informed of the southern way of life." The Daily News was acutely disturbed by such "oblique propaganda as 'gives evidence that Negro people have done much to develop themselves.'" The DAR is understandably unhappy when first-graders are no longer exposed to "the story of the squirrel storing nuts," since it "helped to make America a great nation populated by men and women steadfast in their ability to put into effect their early training for adult life." All but the headiest fans of Lord Keynes may look upon such a lament with sympathy. But listen to what the Citizens Council officially suggests for the third and fourth grades:

> God wanted the white people to live alone. And He wanted colored people to live alone. The white men built America for you. White men built America so they could make the rules. George Washington was a brave and honest white man. The white men cut away big forests. The white man has always been kind to the Negro. We do not believe that God wants us to live together. Negro people like to live by themselves. Negroes use their own bathrooms. They do not use white people's bathrooms. The Negro has his own part of town to live in. This is called our Southern Way of Life. Do you know that some people want the Negroes to live with white people? These people want us to be unhappy. They say we must go to school together. They say we must swim together and use the bathroom together. God had made us different. And God knows best. Did you know that our country will grow weak if we mix the races? White men worked hard to build our country. We want to keep it strong and free.

And some recommendations for the fifth and sixth grades:

The Southern white man has always helped the Negro whenever he could. Southerners were always their best friends. The South went to war to prevent the races from race-mixing. If God had wanted all men to be one color and to be alike, He would not have made the different races. One of the main lessons in the Old Testament of our Bible is that your race should be kept pure. God made different races and put them in different lands. He was satisfied with pure races so man should keep the races pure and be satisfied. BIRDS DO NOT MIX. CHICKENS DO NOT MIX. A friend had 100 white chickens and 100 reds. All the white chickens got to one side of the house, and all the red chickens got on the other side of the house. You probably feel the same way these chickens did whenever you are with people of a different race. God meant it to be that way.

With the makers of the ideology in control and economic opportunity at a minimum, it is not strange that large numbers of the most ambitious Mississippians, the ablest and the most adaptable to change, have left the state year after year. Such constant attrition of potential leadership (proven by the eminence achieved by Mississippi exiles) must be a major reason for the people's unwillingness to discard their ancient folkways. One cannot help speculating as to what degree Mississippi's story would have been more heartening if a sizable proportion of those thousands of bright, perceptive natural leaders among the men and women who have left the state had in some miraculous way found it possible to remain.

Some of those who have left had no choice. They were victims of a state now deservedly famous for its incredible past of police brutality and for the harassment, even to death, of those who defy the code. The state retains a good deal of the frontier recklessness toward human life found by William Howard Russell who noted that casual Mississippi conversations had "a smack of manslaughter about them." In the year after the Brown decision, four Negroes were openly slain, with no conviction for any crime; it would almost seem that when these atrocities had served their purpose, murder as an instrument of policy was then put in cold storage for a time.

On March 31, 1963, the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council released a chronological list of sixty-four acts of violence and intimidation against Negroes since January 1961. The thirty-page indictment of man's inhumanity to man, with its accusations of whippings, shootings, murder, and outrageous debase-ment of the courts, admittedly came from an interested party, but it is characterized by understatement.

Mississippi acts of savagery have often been publicized throughout the world, some beyond their merit. The following examples of harassment by the closed society have been examined with caution and some thoroughness.

For twelve years Eugene Cox and Dr. David Minter, both Southerners, had worked closely together as manager and physician for the white and black families making up the Providence Cooperative, a 2,700-acre farm in Holmes County. On September 27, 1955, at a mass meeting called by leading members of the Citizens Council, Cox and Minter were ordered out of the community, mainly on the basis of evidence recorded in two hours of questioning by Council and county officials of four Negro boys accused of making obscene remarks about a white girl. Allegations of the intermingling of the races at the farm were denied, though it was conceded freely that white and Negro patrons did attend meetings of the credit union together. Threats of violence were made against both men and their families, and, Minter's patients having been intimidated, his medical practice fell off about fifty per cent. An economic boycott was less effective. Professional segregationist Edwin White said, "We just can't afford to have them up there teaching what they are teaching—which will lead to violence unless it is stopped." At the mass assembly Cox admitted his belief that segregation is un-Christian. A planter whose father had been a minister spoke out, "This isn't a Christian meeting." Cox and Minter continued to deny all accusations and offered to make their records available for investigation. White commented, "I do not say these men are Communists, but I do say they are following the Communist line." With threats of arson increasing, and a roadblock arranged by the sheriff, Cox sat up, a rifle across his knees, from midnight to dawn for ten straight nights. Minter stuck it out until July 1956. Cox left for Memphis a month later. In their joint Christmas greeting that year, they recalled: "Only two members of our church wrote to us. A few others have voiced their faith in us, but above these small voices is the frightening SILENCE. It is frightening—not only for us, but for any Christian and American who may wake up some morning to find himself persecuted because of his beliefs, or for unfounded rumors and 'guilt by association.'" the "forgotten man" who had tried to break down the Mississippi education racial barrier without federal aid was languishing in the state penitentiary at Parchman, having been sentenced to a seven-year term for stealing by proxy $25 worth of chicken feed. Much of the evidence points to the conclusion that Clyde Kennard was "framed," though no one seems to know who did it. Born in Hattiesburg, moved to Chicago at twelve, discharged from paratroop service in Korea and Germany in 1952, Kennard meritoriously attended the University of Chicago for three years. Upon the death of his stepfather, he returned to Mississippi to help his mother run a chicken farm in Forrest County. For years he discussed with the president of Mississippi Southern University his possible admission on a voluntary basis. In 1958 he turned down Governor Coleman's offer of education outside the state but obligingly agreed to delay his formal application until after the 1959 Democratic primary. On September 15 he was officially refused admission in a fifteen-minute interview witnessed by the chief investigator for the Sovereignty Commission. Within minutes Kennard was arrested for speeding, then fined for possession of liquor (probably planted) in his car. By 1961 when the Mississippi Supreme Court disposed of this summary justice, Kennard had been convicted as an accessory in the theft of three bags of chicken feed and sentenced to one year's imprisonment for each $3.57 worth of feed allegedly stolen. At most the penalty, assuming guilt, would normally have been ninety days. The illiterate boy who made the theft, if there was one, continued in his job with the feed co-operative.

When James Meredith made his painful entry into Ole Miss,

Though President William D. McCain refused Kennard's application on specious claims of "irregularities" and "questionable" moral character, and is alleged to have said that he could do more to "develop honesty, culture, and individual integrity as president of Mississippi Southern than he can in a silly martyrdom for one Negro," Kennard himself refused to believe that McCain "had anything to do with what happened to me." The subsequent career of Clyde Kennard is a sad one. It includes surgery for cancer at the University Hospital in Jackson in June 1962, unconscionable treatment at Parchman in the months following his operation when he was refused periodic checkups recommended by University doctors, the rapid development of his malignancy, an eight-hour operation in the Billings Hospital at the University of Chicago, and his death in the early summer of 1963. Not long before he died, Kennard was planning to return to his chicken farm and, as he saw it, to help Mississippi "co-ordinate" her race relations. One of his last statements was, "I still think there are a few white people of good will in the state and we have to do something to bring this out."

The most likely candidate in Mississippi for the next Medgar Evers treatment is the president of the state NAACP, Aaron Henry, onetime porter and shoeshine boy in the Old Cotton Bowl Court Hotel in Clarksdale and now owner of a drugstore on Fourth Street. He walks the earth with the sure step and upright carriage of a younger version of another Mississippian, Archie Moore, and he is not likely to be run out of Coahoma County. He does not know how many times the windows in his place of business have been smashed, but the last time, in March 1963, he left for all to see the bricks, the broken glass, and the displays—one of the Declaration of Independence and the other of the Emancipation Proclamation. In 1962 he was convicted of leading a boycott of Clarksdale stores after it had been determined there would be no Negro float in the Christmas parade.

In March, Henry was fined $500 and sentenced to six months in jail by an eighty-year-old justice of the peace for allegedly molesting a white hitchhiker. According to the Daily News reporter, the Bolivar County attorney "during the final arguments, took the Mississippi statute and read to Judge Rowe the disturbing the peace law, explained it to him and told him the maximum sentence and fine." Before defining the sentence, the judge said, "The evidence shows this young man could not have described the interior of the defendant's car unless he was in it." There was no other witness.

When Henry accused the county attorney and police chief of plotting the charge against him, they countered with a libel suit in the Coahoma Circuit Court where the jury awarded them damages of $40,000. All these cases are still in the higher courts. On March 13, 1963, Henry's living room picture window was demolished and his home set afire at two in the morning by gasoline bombs thrown by two young thugs who said they were "just having fun" and were not aware of being in the Negro section of town. Not only did they admit the bombing, but a filling station attendant heard them planning the attack and commenting afterwards that Henry "was lucky to be alive." The first man tried was acquitted of arson by an all-white jury which deliberated for fifteen minutes, and an identical charge against the other was dropped. One of those involved later asked Henry's forgiveness, saying he had been tricked into the nasty business.

In May 1963 the Henry drugstore was rocked by an explosion which ripped a hole in the roof. Sheriff Ross and Deputy State Fire Marshal Hopkins investigated and found that the blast "was caused by a bolt of lightning." Henry wrote: "I am not really sure as to the cause. The hole on top of the roof is much smaller than the rupture in the ceiling. The experts I have talked with contend that lightning does not act that way." It would appear that Henry is not only courageous but more literate than his opposition.

Harassment by the closed society can be savage even when it is not violent. Twenty-eight young Methodist ministers, feeling that they had "a particular obligation to speak," issued by way of the Mississippi Methodist Advocate of January 1963 a "Born of Conviction" statement that still has the state and church in an uproar. They affirmed their belief in the freedom of the pulpit, the brotherhood of man, an unalterable opposition to the closing of the public schools, and an unflinching antagonism toward Communism. Within two weeks the Mississippi Association of Methodist Ministers and Laymen, displaying more churchmanship than religion, had repudiated the "Born of Conviction" pastors, submitted their own "declaration of conscience on racial matters" (drawn up by Medford Evans, Citizens Council consultant, and published in the January issue of the Citizen), and called for a secret referendum on whether or not Methodists wanted their church integrated. Later these conservatives declared integration a "crime against God." The lament of one of the young ministers, that "The power clique which dominates the conference has aligned itself with the Methodist Ministers and Laymen and with the Citizens Council," was corroborated by subsequent events.

The closed society battered the outspoken young preachers upon the anvil of public opinion. By summer ten had left the state, and at least half a dozen more were shifted to urban pulpits. At least half volunteered the feeling that they had not been sufficiently supported by their superintendents and their bishop. Methodists in general, with professional assistance, were reflecting an opinion that had driven from Mississippi sixty-eight of their seminary-trained men since 1954. Dr. W. B. Selah, for eighteen years pastor of the largest Methodist congregation in the state, who had supported the "Born of Conviction" statement and had declared

"there can be no color bar in a Christian church," resigned in protest when five Negroes were refused admission to his church.

The Mississippi Advisory Committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights made, in January 1963, a report on the administration of justice within the state. In a period of fourteen months it had held six open meetings in which a hundred or so Mississippians had testified, though "actively opposed by agents and instrumentalities of the State Government." The legislature in 1960 "passed an act," the committee stated, "to intimidate persons who might wish to assert their rights as citizens by altering the requirement of proof for prosecution of perjury solely in cases where the defendant has testified before this Committee."

In its published findings, the committee declared that "in all important areas of citizenship, a Negro in Mississippi receives substantially less than his due consideration as an American and as a Mississippian." They found that "a pattern exists in our State that leads to the denial of Constitutional rights and, in some instances, to brutality and terror. From the moment a Negro adult is hailed as 'boy' or 'girl' by a police officer, through his arrest, detention, trial—during which his Negro lawyer is treated with contemptuous familiarity by the judge and other officers of the court—and eventual imprisonment, he is treated with a pernicious difference. This difference is incompatible with Christian ideals about the dignity of man and with principles of Anglo-Saxon criminal law." Declaring that "justice under law is not guaranteed for the Negro in Mississippi in the way that it is for the white man," the committee reported that "42.3% of the citizens of this State must either accept an inferior station in life and an attitude of servility or endanger themselves and their families by protesting. We find that terror hangs over the Negro in Mississippi and is an expectancy for those who refuse to accept their color as a badge of inferiority; and terrorism has no proper place in the American form of government." The committee found that "in general the press is failing to meet its obligation to our society. The people of Mississippi are largely unaware of the extent of illegal official violence and the press is partly to blame . . . . When a State disregards a large segment of its population, the Federal Government is compelled to intervene in behalf of the victims."

And the federal government has intervened at the state's best known institution of higher learning, the University of Mississippi. The University has had its moments of greatness, its faculty and administrators of integrity and virtue, and a long history of genteel poverty. In the presidency of Alfred B. Butts (1935-1946) Ole Miss began a precarious climb from the depths of depression despair and the shame of the Bilbo spoliation. For at least a decade after World War II, under the leadership of Chancellor John D. Williams, the University seemed on the verge of living up to the dreams and hopes of its founders and directors of exactly a century before. A tremendous building program on the already beautiful, wooded campus, an expansion of libraries and laboratories, the addition of new departments, and, most exciting of all, the gathering together of an excellent faculty dedicated to good teaching and fruitful research, all of these developments and more were taking place. The new chancellor was adept not only at selling the University to the people but in making it an integral part of many schemes designed to raise the horizons of a long submerged society.

It was increasingly evident in the middle fifties, however, that changes were taking place in the state that would adversely affect the University. In a series of crises from Kershaw (1955) to Kerciu (1963), the administration became more and more appeasement-minded, more and more involved (like a woman constantly professing her virtue) in presenting the Ole Miss story to the state as if it were a bar of soap.

More serious was a 1955 edict of the Board of Trustees requiring the screening of all speakers brought to the campus, a ruling steadfastly opposed by the chancellor at its inception but stoutly defended some years later when he refused even to pass along to the Board a petition of the AAUP calling for an end to the screening. A clergyman was turned away from Religious Emphasis Week when it became known that he had contributed to the NAACP, and the incoming president of the Southern Historical Association was paid his full fee for not delivering a history lecture after the shocking disclosure that his wife had written in the Saturday Evening Post of her teaching experiences with Negro students in Atlanta.

The handling of absurd charges of apostasy and subversion against fourteen members of the University community in 1958 was brought off expeditiously and with a flair for public relations. Faculty members involved in this tempest, which was kept going in the press for almost a year, were asked to remain silent (which most of them did) while the chancellor affirmed his belief in the Bible, an omnipotent God, immortality of the soul, state sovereignty, segregation, and the right of private property. In August 1959 the Board dismissed the allegations against the chancellor and the faculty and stated its policy that "there should prevail at our universities and colleges an atmosphere of freedom in their research, teaching programs and services and that there should be no political or subversive propagandizing in the academic program."

In the past year or so the University of Mississippi has desperately needed the help of all those concerned with its welfare, but, far from being consulted, these friends have been told that things were under control, the situation was returning to normal, enrollment was holding up in great style, just a few professors were leaving. On the anniversary of the insurrection, the director of the University News Service insulted "some few professors" by accusing them of having leveled "bitter attacks" against it to "make national headlines" for the purpose of securing better positions, and it belittled the intelligence of those who remained by stating that "the vast majority" of these had refused more lucrative job offers elsewhere. In a state where higher education is expendable, this bowing before and in fact anticipating every wind may have had a soothing effect on the legislature, but it also indicated a chronic inability to face reality. After all, General Ulysses S. Grant has been the only man in history to make a positive decision not to destroy the University.

Until 1962 the University successfully avoided integration. In that year, on June 26, almost exactly eighteen months after he had first written to the registrar, James Howard Meredith, the "man with a mission and with a nervous stomach," was ordered admitted to the University of Mississippi. Speaking for the Fifth Circuit Court in New Orleans Judge John Minor Wisdom later said that "A full review of the record leads the Court inescapably to the conclusion that from the moment the defendants discovered Meredith was a Negro they engaged in a carefully calculated campaign of delay, harassment, and masterly inactivity. It was a defense designed to discourage and defeat by evasion tactics which would have been a credit to Quintus Fabius Maximus." Tartly reprimanding Judge Sidney Mize of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi for "continuances of doubtful propriety and unreasonably long delays," Judge Wisdom viewed the case as one "tried below and argued here in the eerie atmosphere of never-never land." He might have added, "of the closed society." The contention of the Board of Trustees and of University officials, accepted as fact by Judge Mize, "that the University is not a racially segregated institution" and that "the state has no policy of segregation . . . defies history and common knowledge." There was nothing in the case "reaching the dignity of proof" to make the court think otherwise. "We find that James Meredith's application for transfer to the University of Mississippi was turned down solely because he was a Negro."

Many members of the faculty expressed dismay when Ole Miss officials made uncalled-for affirmations which the court deemed frivolous and when they followed "a determined policy of discrimination by harassment" and assigned as a reason for rejecting Meredith "a trumped-up excuse without any basis except to discriminate." It was hard, too, to comprehend why an administrator would deny that "he understands and interprets the policy of the State of Mississippi as being that negroes and whites are educated in separate institutions of higher learning." More than a hundred years ago Chancellor F. A. P. Barnard had declared that the University's destiny was "to stamp upon the intellectual character of Mississippi the impress it is to wear . . . ."

From September 13, 1962, when Mississippi's long court battle against Meredith reached "the end of the road" in Judge Mize's sweeping injunction and Governor Barnett read his antiquarian interposition proclamation, it was evident to all that the showdown was imminent. In those last hectic days the "power structure" of the state made a rather impressive attempt to control the Barnett juggernaut, but it was too late, and the people were largely unaware of the effort. Moderate statements by Oxford ministers appeared in the Memphis but not the Jackson papers which thundered about taking note "of those who stand with courage in an hour of crisis." The closed society was operating efficiently and almost automatically, as it does in times of great stress, as if it were some malicious Frankenstein monster.

On the Ole Miss campus was circulated a broadside, The Liberty Bulletin, urging students to "Place yourself under the direction of Gov. Barnett. Do not engage yourself in force or violence unless he calls for it." Clarion-Ledger columnist Hills reported that "the governor will watch with a jaundiced eye any attempt to apply punitive action against Mississippi's patriots. College presidents are standing ready to fight alongside the governor, or else."

In the upper house of the legislature on September 25, Senator E. K. Collins arose to remark, "We must win this fight regardless of the cost in time, effort, money and in human lives." Senator

Hayden Campbell thought "they would have to open the doors to murder and rape." Senator Hilbun barked that "these are the same people who won't let our children pray in school." In Washington, Senator Eastland was sure that the next few days would "determine whether a judicial tyranny as black and hideous as any in history exists in the United States."

On Thursday, September 27, the Clarion-Ledger carried a sensational headline to the effect that a "gunbattle" was possible at the University. Representative Walter Hester told the UPI it was "likely" that state officials would attempt to fight off the marshals if they tried to enroll Meredith, but he did not prophesy an all-out insurrection. The situation was "extremely tense and there are some people who don't mind dying for an honorable cause." Either Senator McLaurin or Senator Yarbrough told Senator Lambert that "they were going to provoke the Kennedys into sending troops into Mississippi." Months later, Attorney General Patterson called McLaurin and the "CC & Co." a "little band of would-be ruthless dictators seeking to promote all-out riot and bloodshed on the campus by encouraging the people of Mississippi to pick up their rifles, shotguns and slingshots and go to fight it out with the armed forces of the United States." This could result only in "bloodshed, death, destruction and heartaches."

Barnett talked about jailing any federal officer attempting to arrest a state official. The Daily News was accused by the campus paper, the Mississippian, of distortion, fabrication, "screaming and sensational stories." On the day of the Ole Miss-Vanderbilt football game the hysteria whipped up in Jackson was unbelievable. The press and radio added their bluster to the normal uproar of a conference game. At the half-time ceremonies that night when he still might have turned the populace aside from its madness, the Governor achieved his greatest triumph of oratorical lunacy: "I love Mississippi—I love her people—I love her customs!" Understandably, the man was overcome by his own hoarse eloquence and the reasonless, incoherent, delirious response. He could not go on. The people were bewildered. Television carried the infection statewide, and former Major General Edwin Walker was on his way to Oxford.

The propaganda machine never faltered. The next day, the Sunday that began so peacefully, a joint legislative committee pronounced nine frivolous reasons for denying Meredith admission and cunningly announced that his registration would jeopardize the accreditation of the University to the point of expulsion from the Southern Association of Colleges. In the afternoon and early evening, fatigued students were driving back to the campus, listening to their blaring radios tuned to the appeals of the Citizens Council to "form a human wall around the mansion" to protect the Governor from arrest by federal marshals. Thousands of citizens swarmed the streets of Jackson. Few knew that the Governor, called by an Episcopal priest the "living symbol of lawlessness," had already sold out his closest advisers. Word came that planeloads of marshals had flown out of Memphis. For some time their destination was in doubt. Unknown to most Mississippians, Meredith was, before supper, unpacking his bag in his room in Baxter Hall on the Ole Miss campus.

It was impossible that he could stay without help from the federal government. When Mississippi officials blocked by physical might on four separate occasions Meredith's court-ordered enrollment, and the Fifth Circuit Court wearily acknowledged that it had come to the end of its resources, the President was faced with the alternative of acceptance of the breakdown of law or the employment of force. The admission of Meredith was not negotiable. Kennedy performed his constitutional obligation in the same spirit George Washington had exhibited in the Whisky Rebellion. Having apparently learned the lesson of Little Rock, he insisted upon the use of civilian federal marshals rather than paratroopers. Certainly there had been no stated objection to marshals accompanying Meredith on those expeditions when they had been overcome by superior state power. Whatever "deals" he may have made with the Governor behind the scenes, the President gently and eloquently appealed to the patriotism and sense of sportsmanship of Mississippi citizens in asking them to obey unpopular court decrees. But former Major General Walker having called for 10,000 volunteers to go to the aid of Barnett, and it being general knowledge that hundreds and perhaps thousands were converging on Oxford, there would have been a serious evasion of responsibility had the Army high command not prepared for the emergency. Troops were moved to Memphis. The President earnestly hoped that the job could be done by civilians, and the United States Army was not ordered to the University of Mississippi until it became evident that the marshals were fighting for their lives, and the Army's first contingent arrived just in time to prevent a disaster.

From the arrival of the marshals at the Lyceum Building shortly before five o'clock until the firing of the tear gas at eight, it became increasingly apparent that there was a serious lack of liaison between federal and state officials on the scene. At six the chancellor (at this time not much more than a spectator himself) believed the deal had been made and the game would have to be played out, and the gathering students and faculty were so informed. By seven all observers knew that for whatever reason, the Mississippi Highway Patrol had abandoned its enforcement of law and order and was in fact in some cases encouraging the restless crowd to demonstrate against the marshals. Twice these agents of the federal government donned their masks as the crowd closed in. The campus chief of police and four highway patrolmen had moved back part of the surly crowd (which promptly surged forward again when the officers left that part of the scene) and were achieving some little success in front of the Lyceum Building when the marshals opened fire with gas and drove what almost instantly became a howling mob back to the Confederate monument. Whether Chief Marshal McShane was justified in giving the order to fire at precisely the moment he did is a question for the professionals to answer. It is relevant, however, that two score of faculty members and their wives later testified that the marshals had undergone for at least an hour a constant harassment of obscene language and an increasingly heavy barrage of lighted cigarette butts, stones, bottles, pieces of pipe, and even acid. It is a small matter whether the gas should have come fifteen minutes earlier or later, but rather ironic that a full-scale insurrection should get underway at the exact moment that the President was appealing to Mississippians for fair play in the name of Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar.

Before the work was done that night the Army brought more troops to Mississippi than General Sherman had had in the environs of Oxford exactly a hundred years before. Several hundred reporters soon concentrated on the Mississippi campus to ferret out the facts about what actually had taken place and to inquire into the background for the state's turmoil. By and large the reportage was accurate and the interpretation sound and temperate. Those who have wished to know have had spread before them a reasonably trustworthy record of events.

This is true for all the world except Mississippi. With its long history of being on the defensive against outside criticism and a predisposition to believe their own leaders can do no wrong, the people have been almost completely sold on a palpable and cynical hoax. The closed society immediately projected (in fact, it had foreshadowed) the orthodox version that the insurrection resulted from federal encroachment, deliberately planned by the Kennedys and callously incited by McShane when he called for tear gas. What did happen in front of the Lyceum Building in that crucial hour before eight o'clock on the night of September 30? Truth cries out that the orthodox Mississippi view is false, that cleverness in shifting the culpability for defiance of law from those creating the violence to those enforcing the law could succeed only among a people suffering from a touch of paranoia.

The genesis of the deception which shifted the blame for the insurrection from Mississippians to federal officials came from the University administration. A singularly inaccurate story blaming the "trigger-happy, amateurish, incompetent" marshals and suggesting examples of diabolical brutality toward male and female students was in the hands of Barnett and Eastland within an hour or so of the firing of the gas. These opportunists took up and grossly exaggerated the cry and called for state and federal investigations. By October 2, David Lawrence was to devote his syndicated column to the "official" view of the University. Long after it was made abundantly clear that many faculty members had witnessed the inception of the riot and knew for a certainty about the fraud against the federal government, the administration did not deviate from its original position but, on the contrary, continued to search for evidence condemning the marshals.

On the morning of October 1, Governor Barnett ordered the Mississippi flag at half-mast because "there had been an invasion of our state resulting in blood." The riot, he said, had been touched off by those "inexperienced, nervous and trigger-happy" marshals who had "deliberately inflamed" the people "in order that the resulting resistance can be cited as justification for military force against a sovereign state." Next day the Clarion-Ledger headline, "Eastland, Others Charge [⅜ in.]/Marshals Set Off Ole Miss Rioting[⅞ in.]" was serenity itself compared to a featured column which elaborated the official view: "Our state is labeled insurrectionist because it does not care to be negroid in totality." The columnist did admit a temporary defeat: "So watch the peace-lovers come to the fore, grab a nigger-neck and start bellowing brother love."

The Mississippi Junior Chamber of Commerce distributed almost a half million copies of a 24-page pamphlet entitled Oxford: A Warning for Americans, which put the blame for the insurrection squarely on the shoulders of John and Robert Kennedy. The most specious implication of the pamphlet was that Meredith would have been allowed to enroll peacefully if only the Attorney General had awaited "the completion of the judicial processes," a most unlikely result in a state which had already indulged in so much legal quackery and whose Governor had made it so evident that he would never accept the desegregation of the University. John Satterfield, probable author of the pamphlet and certainly an intimate counselor of Barnett, was now apparently defending his own bad advice which in part came straight from John C. Calhoun. Satterfield has tried to place the mantle of respectability on Barnett's unlawful conduct and to cast doubt on the legality and propriety of the United States government's actions. He threw his weight as past president of the American Bar Association and a prime mover in the Citizens Council into the intellectual propaganda barrage directed at Mississippians, who were unlikely anyhow to pay attention to the statement made on October 2 by the incumbent president of the ABA: "The paramount issue was whether or not the judgment of the court was to be upheld. The executive branch had a clear duty to see that the courts were sustained."

Mr. Satterfield maintained an Olympian objectivity compared to Judge W. M. O'Barr, who in his charge to the LaFayette County grand jury investigating the death of two persons on the night of the insurrection, spoke of the United States Attorney General as "stupid little brother" and described the Supreme Court as made up of "political greedy old men" who "together with the hungry, mad, ruthless, ungodly, power-mad men [in Washington] would change this government from a democracy to a totalitarian dictatorship." The grand jury responded appropriately with an indictment of McShane for precipitating the riot, and for good measure taunted University professors (who had previously defended the marshals) for talking too much.

Support for the state administration came, too, just one month after the insurrection, from Mississippi's Women for Constitutional Government. One of the state's more active groups, they were assembled in Jackson by the sister of the speaker of the House of Representatives to adopt a "bill of grievances" against the "unwarranted and unlawful use of military force" and the alleged violation of Mississippians' civil rights resulting from "the collusion of the President of the United States, the Justice Department, and the Federal courts." The high-flown language of "the thousand angry women" obscured, for Mississippians at least, their exquisitely imaginative account of what had taken place at the University.

In the months after the insurrection, many engaged in the pleasant pastime of guessing whether the Governor was at the moment taking instructions from the "resistance to the death" counselors (the White Muslim clique in the Citizens Council) or from the more cautious who, as one observer put it, had planned only a little riot, who didn't really want to see anybody killed. The Council sent up trial balloons suggesting the closing of the University, called upon faculty moderates (to Simmons, "gutless liberals") to accept segregation or resign, and conducted a postcard campaign directing the Board to fire "quislings and scalawags [who] betray our state and our people in the time of crisis." The extent of the Council's responsibility for open defiance of University authorities by extremist students who returned from weekends at home with suitcases filled with cherry bombs and minds filled with rebellion is still an open question. The Oxford council, whose leaders were dedicated if not brilliant, distributed a mimeographed list of faculty members who were to be harassed with anonymous telephone calls—which did cause some inconvenience because the sleeping habits of the daring dialers did not mesh with those of their victims.

The Mississippi Municipal Association prepared a model speech to be used in winning friends and thwarting enemies. After touching lightly on the notion that court decisions, after all, are not the law of the land and warning of the danger of centralization, the orator was then to rise eloquently to the defense of Mississippi's official conduct: "This action is not a defiance of the law or the courts. Such action is an exercise of the heritage of freedom and liberty under the law preserved for us by our fathers." Although it was not suggested, the more gifted ambassadors could also have sung some lines from the "Ballad of the Ole Miss Invasion":

> They came rolling down from Memphis and dropping > from the skies
> With bayonets for our bellies and tear gas for our eyes
> Some resisted them with brickbats, while others ran and hid,
> Some tangled with the marshals—who can blame them if > they did?

For months it was believed that the General Legislative Investigating Committee would quietly abandon its inquiry into the insurrection as it ran into more and more unpalatable material. Having sent investigators from Washington, Senator Stennis made no report and Senator Eastland shifted his effort to the collection of tall tales by disgruntled students against their instructors. The Mississippi Senate of course did not need facts to plead with the country to "join our State in defiance of all who would destroy our freedoms, heritage and constitutional rights." Only one senator called for secession, a few more demanded Kennedy's impeachment, while others galloped up and down the land to warn their countrymen of the coming of the orange-jackets, those federal fiends whose savage brutalities at Oxford had "stopped short of Nazi atrocities only in that there were no deaths."

The legislative committee took six months to put together from the sworn statements of more than ninety witnesses its masterpiece of sententious fiction. For reasons never explained, faculty witnesses and even legislators who had been at Ole Miss with the federalized national guard had not been called upon to testify. There was no minority report. How scores of the world's crack reporters had been kept from seeing the blundering and the repeated brutalities and "planned physical torture" of the marshals, the women students hit by projectiles fired at point-blank range, the deliberate gassing of seven dormitories, the "torture slab," the army truck set on fire by "a folded paper airplane," and dozens of other Alice-in-Wonderland concoctions will remain one of the mysteries of twentieth-century journalism. It was the sad commentary of an eyewitness that the "young gentlemen of the New Confederacy," who were able to glorify insurrectionist conduct as "freedom fighters" in the "Brick and Bottle Brigade"—attacking the armed forces of their own country—would have small compunction about lying to a legislative investigating committee, especially one that made perfectly clear what it wanted to hear.

The legislative report was "verified" in advance by a documentary film, "Oxford, U. S. A.," depicting "how the federal government violated the constitution in the invasion of Mississippi last fall." Just before he sold three copies to the Sovereignty Commission for almost $7,000, the producer asserted the picture was "based strictly on the Constitution" and had been endorsed by Governors Barnett and Wallace. According to billboard advertising, it "EXPOSES FEDERAL ATROCITIES." Actually, about half of the fifty-minute extravaganza is taken up with poorly filmed statements from Barnett, Johnson, Attorney General Patterson, Chief of the Highway Patrol Birdsong, and a legislator who makes some disparaging and untrue remarks about the University and Meredith. The opening action shot shows motorized troops moving into Oxford, which they did—about eight hours after the beginning of the insurrection. By implication the viewer gets the impression that marshals had fired shotguns (which they did not have) at innocent students and even that they had killed the French reporter. Altogether the film is a shabby conglomeration of falsehood, distortion, and political dissemblance unlikely to convince the fair-minded who may be left in the membership of the Citizens Council.

The people of Mississippi have thus once again been victimized, this time by a gigantic hoax perpetrated on them by their own timeserving leaders whose sense of loyalty is only to the false orthodoxy of the closed society.

The closed society is never the absolute society. There always have been and there always will be the dissenters, the doubters who point to the road not taken. In the past year more than fifty professors have departed from the University of Mississippi, many of them literally driven from the state. The best of them, particularly the native Mississippians, would have remained if there had been any prospect of an atmosphere of freedom or a decent chance to fight for one.

No, the closed society is not absolute. In Mississippi there are legislators, editors, lawyers, labor leaders, educators, and ordinary citizens who sometimes protest against the prevailing orthodoxy. The day that Barnett let loose his interposition blast, Ira Harkey pointed out in the Pascagoula Chronicle that it was not the Kennedys but "the United States of America, democracy itself, the whole of humanity" that was making demands upon Mississippi. In a series of five short, logical articles, Representative Karl Wiesenburg demonstrated conclusively that Barnett's course was "the road to riot," that the Governor had violated his oath of office, that the bloodshed on September 30 was the "price of defiance," and that states have responsibilities as well as rights. The Mississippi Methodist Advocate accepted for the church part of the guilt for the riot.

Three days after the insurrection, the Ole Miss chapter of the American Association of University Professors adopted a ringing statement protesting the fraud against the marshals. Without a campaign in its favor more than seventy faculty members signed the document as their way of "standing up to be counted." A professor of anthropology made his protest by putting into writing the conclusions of those in his profession concerning the validity of Putnam's Race and Reason, and this was serialized in the Pascagoula Chronicle. The exemplary conduct of more than 3,000 federalized Mississippi national guardsmen is worth the scrutiny and praise of all Americans. General W. P. Wilson said, "There were absolutely no incidents of any individual wilfully refusing to report for mobilization." George Fielding Eliot paid high tribute to the state guard: "In its ranks are men who, as citizens, share some of the views and even the prejudices of their fellow Mississippians. But when the call to duty came, they laid all else aside. After that they were soldiers of the United States, summoned by the President to aid in enforcing the laws of the Union, as the Constitution provides." One guardsman who had suffered rough treatment at the hands of the hoodlums, went right to the heart of the matter: "It was just the matter of an oath I took."

There are many thousands of "men of good will" in Mississippi, mild-mannered people for the most part, who in their day-to-day affairs do what they can to ameliorate the difficult conditions imposed upon their fellowmen by the closed society. But because of a strong desire to live in peace or because of one kind or another of fear, these men will not openly protest what they know in their hearts are gross evils all about them. These are the individuals who, when one of their own number speaks out or in some little way defies the orthodoxy and is pilloried as a result, shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, he asked for it."

Men of good will are not enough. In his article in the Saturday Evening Post after the riot, John Faulkner professed surprise at a plea to return to law and order: "this to us, the responsible people of Oxford, who raised no finger against any man." In high indignation he refused to see the need for penitence: "If all the sin I have to answer for is my part in bringing on what happened here Sunday and Monday, then I relinquish my place to someone more needful of forgiveness than I." Perhaps Mr. Faulkner said more than he intended, perhaps he was speaking for all the good men who to whatever degree had abandoned the feeling of accountability for conditions in Mississippi. These same men were shocked to learn, probably at Leslie's drugstore, the price of defiance as well as the fact that some of their neighbors were throwing rocks at other neighbors in the uniform of the United States government. But they were not moved by the riot—they were solidified. They had forgotten, if they had ever known, that it was not Gavin

Stevens who had prevented the lynching of Lucas Beauchamp, but Miss Habersham, Chick Mallison, and Aleck Sander.

The more embattled the closed society becomes, the more monolithic, the more corrupt, and the more willing to engage in double-think and double-talk. There is Mississippi's institutionalized hypocrisy that the Negro can freely vote and freely attend the university of his choice. There is the casuistry of Governor Barnett that he is preserving law and order and upholding the Constitution by physically obstructing the execution of an explicit directive of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States. There is the legislature shamefully passing laws which the judges "will know how to handle" or for the purpose of "getting" certain individuals. The idea that this is a nation of laws and not of men, constantly reiterated within the state, has a hollow ring in Mississippi. How few of its leaders can come into court with clean hands!

Hostility to authority and disrespect for law are commonplace in Mississippi. How could it be otherwise in a state which tolerates the cynical disregard of prohibition and collects the black-market tax? How can anything else be expected when the state itself brazenly tells the world it has achieved "separate but equal" school facilities, when in 1959-1960 local school expenditures were $81.86 for the white child as against $21.77 for the colored? Or when, as in 1951, the county superintendents of education, looking greedily toward the allocation of equalization funds, reported 895,779 children of educable age (6-20) while the United States census of 1950 listed the number of children from 5 to 19 as only 651,600? What respect can there be for the legal process when one standard of justice prevails when a Negro commits a crime against a Negro, another when a Negro commits a crime against a white, still another when a white commits a crime against a white, and a fourth when a white commits a crime against a Negro?

What can be said about the morality of a social order that sends a teen-age colored girl to a long term in an institution for delinquents because, by walking from school to the courthouse, she is held to have violated an injunction against demonstrations? And, when questioned, justifies the exorbitant penalty on the basis of previous abortions—which up to the time of her sentence the society had ignored? Which is immoral, the girl or the society?

In spite of the closed society the Negro has made some gains since his emancipation a century ago. In the same period, the white man, determined to defend his way of life at all costs, has compromised his old virtues, his integrity, his once unassailable character. He has so corrupted the language itself that he says one thing while meaning another. He no longer has freedom of choice in the realm of ideas because they must first be harmonized with the orthodoxy. New currents of thought he automatically distrusts, and if they clash with the prevailing wisdom he ruthlessly rules them out. He cannot allow himself the luxury of thinking about a problem on its merits. In spite of what he claims, the white Mississippian is not even conservative—he is merely negative. He grows up being against most things other men at least have the pleasure of arguing about. All his life he spends on the defensive. The most he can hope for is to put up a good fight before losing. This is the Mississippi way, this is the Mississippi heritage. It will ever be thus as long as the closed society endures.

Although there have been moments of enlightenment, the spiritual secession of Mississippi from history has never ended. For more than a century Mississippians have refused to be bound by the national will. Perhaps this recalcitrance could be borne with in the past, as have been many other excesses of democracy. But with the sanctuary provided by the oceans gone, the national interest, the instinct for survival, demand discipline. They demand also that attitudes or "principles" growing out of racial situations not be allowed to intrude themselves into the country's policy making decisions. Since Reconstruction Mississippians have had no real reason to believe that they were not free to handle the race question as they wished, without meaningful interference from the federal government; and, when they now discover that all their bluster and subterfuge and intransigence will avail them nothing, they have little to fall back on except blind rage and fierce hatred.

In committing itself to the defense of the biracial system, Mississippi has erected a totalitarian society which to the present moment has eliminated the ordinary processes by which change may be channeled. Through its police power, coercion and force prevail, instead of accommodation, and the result is social paralysis. Thus, the Mississippian who prides himself on his individuality in reality lives in a climate where nonconformity is forbidden, where the white man is not free, where he does not dare to express a deviating opinion without looking over his shoulder. Not only is the black man not allowed to forget that he is a nigger, but the white moderate must distinctly understand that he is a "nigger-lover."

Mississippi has long been a hyperorthodox social order in which the individual has no option except to be loyal to the will of the white majority. And the white majority has subscribed to an inflexible philosophy which is not based on fact, logic, or reason. Nonwhite Mississippians and all others are outlanders. Close contiguity with a large repressed population and fear of what these "inferior" people might do have held the society near the point of unanimity. Especially in times of stress the orthodoxy becomes more rigid, more removed from reality, and the conformity demanded to it more extreme. Today the advocacy or even the recognition of the inevitability of change becomes a social felony, or worse. Mississippi is the way it is not because of its views on the Negro—here it is simply "the South exaggerated" —but because of its closed society, its refusal to allow freedom of inquiry or to tolerate "error of opinion." The social order that refuses to conform to national standards insists upon strict conformity at home. While complaining of its own persecuted minority station in the United States, it rarely considers the Negro minority as having rights in Mississippi.

Perhaps the greatest tragedy of the closed society is the refusal of its citizens to believe that there is any view other than the orthodox. In recent years there has been a hardening attitude among college students who do not want to hear the other side. In such a twilight of nondiscussion, minds not only do not grow tough, they do not grow at all. Intelligent men with ideas are isolated from the rest of the community, and what little interracial communication existed in the past is now destroyed. One reason the Ole Miss faculty failed to protest an ugly situation before the insurrection was that through one means or another freedom of speech had long since been curtailed. This was at least a partial cause for from eight to ten members of the history department leaving in the two years before the troubles of last year. The jolt of the violence on the campus and the obvious fraud against the federal government initiated a spurt of resistance to ignorance, stupidity, and conformity. For the moment many of the faculty developed a healthy scorn for expediency and security. In the light of Mississippi's history it was probably already too late to expect anything more than an occasional stand, such as that put up by the ministers who were willing to count the cost and pay the price. With the great silence from the men of good will, and the disposition of the good people to let things run their course, there can be little hope for anything constructive in Mississippi in the next decade.

It can be argued that in the history of the United States democracy has produced great leaders in great crises. Sad as it may be, the opposite has been true in Mississippi. As yet there is little evidence that the society of the closed mind will ever possess the moral resources to reform itself, or the capacity for self-examination, or even the tolerance of self-examination. Inasmuch as a nation marching swiftly in the direction of the fulfillment of the promise of the Declaration of Independence and the Emancipation Proclamation is at the same time fighting for survival against Communism, it will not much longer indulge the frustration of its will. Nevertheless, it would seem that for the foreseeable future the people of Mississippi will plod along the troubled road of resistance, violence, anguish, and injustice, moving slowly until engulfed in the predictable cataclysm.

And yet, in spite of all that has been presented in this paper, it seems inescapable that Mississippians one day will drop the mockery of the late Confederacy and resume their obligations as Americans. It is just that there is small reason to believe that they will somehow develop the capability to do it themselves, to do it, as William Faulkner said, in time. If not, the closed society will become the open society with the massive aid of the country as a whole, backed by the power and authority of the federal government.

CHAPTER I

Introduction

In the Spring of 1964 we spent a number of days visiting the school systems of a county in Georgia and a county in South Carolina. We wanted to look at examples of southern rural school systems. For many years the schools in the large cities of the nation have struggled with the educational deficiencies imposed on them by migrants from the rural South. We went to look at the roots of this problem. We went knowing then, as we know now, that large numbers of people from such areas grow up without an adequate education. We also knew before we started that school segregation did not help the situation; in fact, desegregation of the schools was in our minds as a certainly proper and a probably helpful step. Unquestionably what we saw in these two counties was influenced by our preconceptions.

Still, we were strongly impressed in two ways. First, in both school systems large numbers of intelligent, energetic, and sensitive people are performing remarkably well and in a professional fashion. We, therefore, do not believe that if one could put an appropriate number of the teachers and administrators drawn from one of our better suburban districts into these two systems, many of the school problems would thereby be solved. Secondly, the feature of life in these communities that struck me most forcefully was the dominant role played by race and segregation in the lives of all. Even the two of us raised in the South were impressed all over again with the salience of race in the thoughts, actions, and patterns of life of the citizens, white and Negro alike, in these two counties.

These two impressions have been the leading influences in what we see as the educational problems facing rural areas of this sort and what we think might be done about these problems. The first impression has led us to propose drastic changes in the arrangement of the school system. It seemed clear to us that, if people of the calibre we encountered in these county school systems are unable to do any better than they are doing, it is not possible to achieve the desired improvements in children's learning by doing more adequately the same sort of things. It seemed evident to us that some basic changes in the system itself would be necessary to accomplish much. Our second strong impression suggested what the first step in this direction needs to be. We concluded that the starting point for improvement of education in such communities must be the complete elimination of segregation. It seems to us that these two basic propositions have not been fully faced by those concerned with education, either in communities of this sort or anywhere else in the country.

To be sure, the situation has changed dramatically since the Spring of 1964. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 mean that formal desegregation of school systems in counties of this sort is beginning to take place and that relatively large amounts of federal funds are now available to these systems. These are helpful steps, but by themselves they are not enough.

It is our purpose in this report to explain why they are not enough and especially why, after formal desegregation, ordinary school improvements are still likely to prove inadequate. To this end our discussion will include brief descriptions of the conditions of living and of education we found in the counties visited; these examples are offered in the hope that our discussion of the nature of the basic educational problem will be clearer. Finally, again using the two school systems for illustration, we shall offer some suggestions for changes in the standard pattern of schooling which we believe indicate the kind of alterations conditions in the rural South make necessary.

Inadequate education is a prominent feature of life for most people growing up in the rural South; so is poverty, so is segregation. We have asserted that the elimination of segregation is the first step toward making the education adequate. But this simple assertion does not dispose of the matter because segregation is not a simple matter; it is complicated, and it is a particularly difficult fact to come to terms with in education. Segregation doesn't just mean that white children go to "white" schools with white teachers (but Negro janitors), while Negro children go to "black" schools with Negro teachers (and no janitors). Segregation creeps into the fiber of the society and culture within which education as a process takes place. There are many practices which could be cited as part of the general fact of segregation, but it isn't always clear just how these practices affect education—only that they do, directly or indirectly.

What does it mean for education when Negro adults, regardless of status and personal attainment, are all called by their first names by all the members of the white community they meet? What does it mean for education if there are no Negro doctors or Negro lawyers in a community on the one hand, and no white janitors or white maids on the other? What does it mean for education if life is so arranged that to the casual, uninformed visitor, the group which in fact constitutes the majority in a community appears to be a tiny and unimportant minority? What does it mean for education when the language used in all the books studied by a child is not the same as that used by anyone like him? What does it mean when all the pictures in the books, about both present and past times, are of members of another group?

To put it another way, education always takes place in a context. If a community being served by a school is largely lower middle class, then this fact tells something about the kinds of values and the kinds of expectations children bring to school with them. It tells something about the kinds of things that parents are likely to want for their children, and are likely to expect the school to provide. If 50% of a high school's graduates go on to college, then certain kinds of educational practices are obviously more appropriate than others. If 70% of the children who leave high school go into industrial jobs, then certain other kinds of practices are called for.

In rural southern communities, these ordinary difficulties are multiplied by the fact of segregation. One can expect some of the white students in the community to return as doctors or lawyers, and the like. But what of the Negro students? The manners and mores of the great middle class are perhaps obviously appropriate for the white students, but are they for the Negroes? Every student must be taught the responsibilities of good citizenship, such as the responsibility of voting, but are Negroes expected to vote? Whatever facet of the community one chooses to study in order to relate it to educational practice, the picture is complicated by the fact of segregation, and if the full intellectual development of all children is the goal of education, then segregation is inappropriate. Segregation is corrosive of the basic processes that make it possible for education to take place.

For example, a child who asks questions about the society around him must be answered honestly, for his full intellectual growth. In fact a child needs the stimulation to ask such questions as well as honest answers to the questions to attain this growth. The answers one can give to a Negro child in a fully segregated society amount either to the assertion that he is inferior, or that he is being treated unjustly. A child who accepts the notion that he is inferior loses much of his drive to achieve. A child who believes he is being treated unjustly is angry and frustrated, so that while he will have strong drives, he will not learn to think well or clearly. Thus, either answer will arouse feelings that will thereafter interfere with intellectual growth. The remaining alternative, and probably the course adopted most often, is to prevent the children from asking questions. This, also, interferes with adequate education.

An analogous difficulty is created for the white child. In such communities he also is not encouraged to ask questions about segregation and certainly it must often happen that when he does the answers given are not accurate, although on occasion they may be honest as the teacher sees it. These conditions also are less than positive contributions to intellectual growth. However, for the white child, in contrast to the Negro, there is the encouragement and stimulation to intellectual growth that can come from the belief in one's superior ability to learn. Probably more serious are the distorted views of his responsibilities as a citizen that develop as he learns to ignore the incongruities between the practices of segregation and the statements about equality and freedom he is asked to learn.

In short, it is immediately, painfully, and unmistakably obvious that in southern rural communities Negroes are assigned an inferior role, and it follows directly that for Negro children especially, proper intellectual growth is impossible. Segregation is both the symbol of this situation and the means for its maintenance. Consequently, we do not believe a proper education for any child, white or Negro, can be provided in a segregated system.

But school desegregation is only one of the changes needed to eliminate segregation as an influence on education, and it is beyond the scope of this report (and our ability) to discuss the ways of accomplishing legal desegregation. Our suggestions are designed to help solve the educational problems that remain after this necessary condition to intellectual development has been established.

This does not mean that we shall avoid further consideration of the fact of segregation. As a pervasive and dominant feature of life, its role in education requires repeated attention. We shall assume, however, that the educational practices we are proposing will take place in school systems in which all concerned treat race as irrelevant to educational decisions. Recognizing that this assumption is currently contrary to fact let us turn to our second proposition. It is that legal desegregation is only the first step and that in rural Black Belt areas profound educational problems will remain. The nature of these problems can best be understood by looking more closely at the life of these areas.

CHAPTER II

Two Rural Counties

A. Geography and Economics

Burke County is just south of Augusta on the Savannah River. As counties go in Georgia, Burke is large; it is roughly triangular with each side extending for about 40 miles. While not flat, there are no large hills and most of the land is arable. There is one central town, Waynesboro, in which about one-fourth of the county's 20,000 residents live. The remaining three-fourths are spread throughout the county in such a way that there are few clusters of population sufficient to support schools. There are a half-dozen much smaller towns scattered around the county, several of them near the apexes of the triangle; these towns are rapidly dying, and in some cases, are already too small to justify a school of their own.

This dispersion creates problems of several kinds. It complicates the sheer mechanical problem of getting children together in sufficient numbers for a sufficient length of time to have a full school day. It means that many children spend unreasonable lengths of time getting to and from school, and, for many of the children, that contact with other children outside their own families is largely limited to the chances schools (and buses) provide.

These facts are important because children probably do more to educate each other than schools as such do, which is one reason why it is difficult to raise the educational level of a community by "good" schools or lower it by "bad" schools. We do not mean that a group of children without a school would learn what they would in school. We mean that by acting as models for each other, by setting standards and by supporting or squelching each other's interests and expectations, the children in the classes of all but the most rare teachers set both the upper and lower limits of achievement. The most strenuous efforts of teachers, principals, and superintendents rarely alter these limits. For the most part, the time and effort spent going to and from schools is not a very constructive force in children's education. Long rides in crowded, noisy buses do not provide learning conditions conducive to academic progress. These particular educational problems are probably characteristic of most rural school systems, although they undoubtedly vary in degree.

The economic conditions in Burke County also create educational problems.[1] Historically, the county depended on agriculture (principally cotton) for its economic health, and agricultural activities are important sources of livelihood still, especially for Negroes. The county has a few small industries which do not depend upon agriculture. These industries have not greatly increased in number or size in recent years, and have not been able to counteract the problems created by the shrinking number of jobs in agriculture; they mostly employ only whites, the group least in need of job opportunities. Cotton production was once an adequate basis for a plantation economy employing many people. Twenty-five years ago, farming alone employed more people than are in the total labor force today. But while there is still substantial cotton acreage, it has proved to be an increasingly inadequate source of income for the county.

The amount of land being farmed has declined a bit (10% since 1945), but the number of farms has declined even more (50% since 1945), because the size of farms has increased (84% since 1945). Burke County has always had some large plantations. It still does. But for a long time Burke also had many small farms, a number of which were owned by Negroes. The average size of farms is increasing partly because these Negro farmers are being put out of business. The declining number of Negro farm operators indicates that the Negro is among the first victims of the complex and mounting pressures on small farmers. Heavy machinery and technically trained personnel are increasingly necessary for successful farming. All of these phenomena, then, point to the same thing: a dramatic reduction in the need for unskilled farm labor, a fact which means in a place like Burke that there is no longer much need for Negro labor.

Table 1 shows these and other economic facts about Burke County. One obvious consequence of these conditions is widespread poverty, especially among Negroes. As shown in Table 2, the 1960 census data indicate the median family income of Burke Negroes was approximately $1,200 a year, less than half of the $3,000 per year now commonly cited as the minimum needed by the typical family in the United States. Only 11% of the Negro families in Burke County had in 1960 incomes of $3,000 or more per year, while two-thirds of the white families had incomes meeting or exceeding this minimum. In short, a large portion of Negroes in Burke County live in conditions of severe poverty and have little prospect of change as long as they remain in the county. There are also substantial numbers of whites who live in conditions of poverty, but their prospect of a better future is not quite so plainly unattainable.

It is not surprising that the Negro population in Burke has decreased more than 18% between 1950 and 1960, while the white population has remained fairly stable (see Table 3). Not too many years ago, Negroes made up more than 80% of the population in Burke County. Today, about two-thirds of the population is Negro, but among adults the ratio of whites to Negroes is beginning to approach 1 to 1. It should be noted that not only does this suggest that Negroes tend to have larger families than the white residents of the county, but it also reflects the fact that a great many Negro parents leave their children in the county while they go to cities to work. A crude survey taken in Edgefield County suggests that approximately 25% of the Negro children in the schools had one or both parents working and living somewhere else (usually in the North). While the parents migrate, they frequently let the county educate their children. Migration, then, relieves the county of less of the educational burden than the migration rate suggests.

Edgefield County is across the Savannah River in South Carolina about as far north of Augusta as Burke is south of Augusta. Like Burke, it is roughly triangular, but a bit smaller, with each side running roughly 30 rather than 40 miles. In one sense, it is even smaller than that size indicates, since much of the northern border of the county is part of Sumter National Forest, and is thinly populated. The county has three sizeable towns: Edgefield, Johnston, and Trenton. While Trenton is shrinking, both Edgefield and Johnston are reasonably vigorous communities more than holding their own in size (i.e. slight growth, as in Waynesboro). Another important difference is that while Edgefield was also once primarily a cotton producing county, it is now a peach producing area, and much of the land is in peach orchards. The agricultural problems of the county seem slightly less severe than those of Burke County, but a glance at Table 1 will show that the changes have been about the same with respect to number of farms, their size, and the role played by Negro operators. Exactly as in Burke, the number of farms has decreased dramatically while average size has increased, and it has been the Negro operator who has been squeezed the most. In Edgefield as in Burke, agriculture is no longer the principal kind of employment.

Unlike Burke, however, employment opportunities for Negroes in industry have increased. The number of such jobs is still not large, but the difference in direction of change is probably one reason why Edgefield has lost less of its Negro population (see Tables 2 and 3).

Perhaps the most prominent difference is the use the citizens of Edgefield County make of employment opportunities outside the county. For example, a perceptible number of citizens of the community work at the Savannah River Project, a large nearby Atomic Energy Commission installation. Burke County, directly across the river from the project (but the nearest bridge is in Augusta), has few residents who work at the project, and has at least some prominent citizens who are pleased rather than irritated at this lack of involvement with the federal government. In Edgefield, both whites and Negroes find work outside the county, not only at the Savannah River Project but in Aiken, Augusta, and in the counties east and north of Edgefield. Nevertheless, while Negroes have not been totally excluded from industrial jobs in Edgefield, to date at least, industrial employment has not been a substantial solution to their problems. Income of the people in Edgefield, while a little better than in Burke, still puts a substantial number of whites and most of the Negroes in the poverty-stricken category. The median family income among Negroes in Edgefield, as Table 2 indicates, was approximately $1,600 a year. This is severe poverty. The consequences with respect to population have been much the same in Edgefield as in Burke, the Negro population having declined about 10% between 1950 and 1960. Furthermore, the white population declined by about 3% as well. Back in 1920, the Negroes were about three-quarters of the population in Edgefield County; now they are barely more than half. The rate of Negro emigration from Edgefield in proportion to the total population, however, has decreased in recent years, compared with the 1930's and 1940's.

In both Burke and Edgefield Counties, and in counties similar to them, unless there are dramatic changes in trends, large numbers of children will continue living and going to school under conditions of severe poverty, with little prospect of bettering themselves in their home communities. Most of those who do succeed in getting educated will leave home. The prospects for those who stay are dim indeed among the Negroes. A fair number of the better educated and more successful white youths will also find it advantageous to leave these counties, as they, too, have been doing.

The consequences for education are many. These affect Negro and white students somewhat differently. If a Negro student and his parents are to see that education is a path to an adequate livelihood as an adult, they must recognize that the student is preparing to live somewhere else. In other words, they must have enough foresight and enough knowledge of the world to understand what is needed in other parts of the country. Generally speaking, such knowledge and foresight come through education. On the other hand, the white student, although he may also see greater opportunities outside of his county, can see that he probably can make an adequate living at home, provided he acquires an appropriate education. For whites, education provides immediate visible opportunities; for Negroes, education provides the only possible opportunity, but it is less visible. This lack of visibility is only one of the reasons why the educational efforts of the school systems are not very successful, and why segregation stymies educational progress.

One way of describing this situation is to say that for the Negro attempting to live in his home, neither education nor anything else leads anywhere. Essentially, it is a situation of "no hope." This problem's solution clearly involves recommendations that go far beyond the field of education.

There are no educational recommendations that will be sufficient even to attack the problems of "no hope" in education, because these problems stem from the function of education in a society. What good will imaginatively conceived vocational education programs be if there is no place in society for the use of skills developed? What good will supplementary educational services be if education itself fits an individual to live in a social, cultural, and economic milieu that simply does not exist? Educational recommendations cannot have their proper effect unless something is done to allow the use of education by all members of society. In order for education to have its desired effect, the problem of giving hope to education must be addressed and solved by the community. Fundamentally, this means that the community must display to the school that educational accomplishment entitles one to social, cultural, and economic rewards. The rural communities of the Black Belt South do not do this, and until and unless they do, plans, energies, and money poured into their schools will do little to solve their basic educational problems.

This means that Negroes must be allowed to compete openly for jobs, and that there must be jobs; it means that cultural opportunities must be made available to all who want them and are ready to appreciate them, and that there must be cultural opportunities; it means that social interaction must become a function of natural factors such as temperament, education, concern, and interest. In sum there are no educational recommendations we can make that will restore hope to education; to alter the function of education for the Negro community means to make the good things of a free society available to all men.

B. The School

At first glance, the schools of Burke County appear to be much like those anywhere. The buildings and the classrooms, ranging from old to new, look much like those one would encounter anywhere in the United States. Of the roughly 7,000 children of school age in the county, about 4,500 Negro and 1,800 white are enrolled in the schools; apparently, some 700-800 children, mostly Negro, are not in school. The white population is served by three high schools and five elementary schools, while the Negro population is served by one high school and six elementary schools. Average daily attendance of students in the system is fair, but is higher among the white (88%) than among the Negro (78%) students. This difference is at least partly because some Negro children do not enter school in the fall until after crops are harvested. Both the curriculum and the general arrangements of the schools appear fairly typical of what one might find in any school. The system is probably not unlike those in the rural South generally but, if anything, somewhat better than the average of these systems. In fact, given the basic conditions in which the system functions, it can be called a good system.

We have already described two of these conditions: the severe and widespread poverty and the low and decreasing density of population in most of the county. A third condition is partly but not entirely a consequence of the first. This is the fact that monies for school operations in Burke County are very nearly at the minimum the state permits. About 88% of these school funds come from the state (1963-64 data), and what little the county raises over and above that required by the state is spent for the teachers in unconsolidated white schools that the state will not support. In spite of the extensive poverty in the county, it could clearly spend more for education. Per pupil expenditures for the county in average daily attendance figures were slightly over $265 in 1963-64. The corresponding figures for Atlanta, for Georgia as a whole, and for the entire country were $380, $295, and $460, respectively.

The fourth and last condition is—as of 1964-65 at least—total segregation, the importance of which we have already discussed briefly. Actually, there are two parallel school systems with an entirely white superstructure. The parallelism is not perfect, since the Negro system is not only twice as large but is fully consolidated and in fairly new but poorly equipped buildings. The Negro high school is about as well equipped as the white high schools. Most of these structures were built shorly after the 1954 Supreme Court decision. The white schools are not fully consolidated, are only partly in modern buildings, but are, with the exception noted, somewhat better equipped and more adequately staffed (numerically, at least) than the Negro schools. Segregation is, of course, a universal fact of life in this county, and it should be noted that the discrepancies favoring the white schools over the Negro schools are far smaller than the discrepancies in almost all other aspects of life.

Within the limits of these conditions, it is fair to rate the school system a pretty good one. Despite its shortcomings, the physical facilities are not markedly poor for American schools (although the libraries are); the paper qualifications of the school personnel are at the state average; and the children do somewhat better academically than some data on Georgia children indicate as state average. Table 5 shows some of these data in the form of average lag in grade placement scores of Georgia children relative to national norms. Burke County children appear to do a bit better than this; white high school children are close to the national norms, and it appears probable that the Negro children, though considerably lower than the national norm, are a bit above the state average for Negroes. Dropout rates and progress through school also meet state averages insofar as it is possible to get hard data on this matter; neither the state nor the county keeps records adequate for fully assessing this point. However, the age-grade enrollment figures shown in Table 6 seem to indicate that the rate at which children progress through the grades is much like that found elsewhere in the state. Finally, it should be carefully noted that the system has its quota of able, competent, and industrious school personnel; all things considered, perhaps more than its share in the Negro system.

Obviously, even within the social and economic framework given, improvements are possible. Consolidation could be completed; more local money could be found; libraries could be developed; and so on indefinitely. But the same sort of statement could be made about almost any school system. For those who like the status quo in the community and especially those interested in maintaining total segregation and minimum expenditure for school operation, the system is satisfactory. In the white community, such satisfaction is a common, perhaps dominant, feeling. There are, of course, some white citizens who want improvements in the white schools, but they do not appear to be an important segment of the community. Perhaps a few of these same people, but not many of them, are dissatisfied with the conditions in the Negro schools.

Among the Negro population, dissatisfaction with the schools is probably not common either. In fact, for large numbers of the Negroes in this county the schools are better than they really believe is necessary. While among the Negro school personnel there is some dissatisfaction with conditions, many of them are pleased because conditions are vastly better than they were only a few short years ago. It would be difficult to maintain that any substantial proportion of the Negro community is unhappy with the schools, especially since it appears doubtful that there are many outside the professional personnel who are aware of the shortcomings that exist.

To repeat, within the framework of the basic conditions outlined, the school system is performing well and to the satisfaction of the people being served, and we suspect that few school systems working within familiar conditions do much better. Let us look more closely, however, at what this means. Taking the white schools first, although they serve a clientele well above the average of the county socially, economically, and intellectually, their students do not typically fall into an above-average group on a national basis. Only about 40% graduate from high school, and of these only two-thirds go to college; even this relatively privileged minority in the county, i.e., the white citizens, do not contribute their share of developed talent to the nation. Only so long as Burke County can maintain its relative isolation will this white system prove satisfactory even to the county itself.

Clearly, however, the white schools are not where the serious problems in the county's educational system lie, in any immediate sense. They are to be found instead in the Negro schools and in the Negro community. Problems here are very serious indeed. These schools, like most in Georgia, do far better than they did a few short years ago but, still, fewer than 40% of the students reach grade ten, and only about one in seven graduate from high school (see Table 6). When it is recognized that for these Negro children in Burke, as almost anywhere else in similar areas, a high school diploma represents, on the average, a level of academic and intellectual development far short of the typical tenth grade student in the United States (see Table 5) the seriousness of this problem can be seen. It appears probable that among the 400-450 Negro children of a given age in the county, fewer than 20 will ever develop intellectually and academically to a point where they might be called average in this nation. Of about 4,500 school children, 4,200 must be classified as academically retarded or slow by the end of their school careers. This appalling fact is evidently characteristic of the rural South.

Although there are some differences, the similarities between Burke's schools and those of Edgefield are more marked than the differences. Those differences that exist are not large. The white schools in Edgefield County seem a little more open to the world, and somewhat more intellectually diverse and stimulating. Strom Thurmond High School in Edgefield is not only well equipped, but reflects an attempt to incorporate new ideas in school planning into its structure. The new Waynesboro High School in Burke County is much less well equipped, and does not show signs of such an attempt. Perhaps another symptom, or perhaps a cause, of this difference is the fact that the white high schools in Edgefield were recently consolidated in spite of an ancient football rivalry. The Negro schools are fully consolidated, a little less well equipped than the Negro schools in Burke County, and more than in Burke Negro schoolmen seemed committed to working within the current framework and to not attempting any serious alteration of the prospects of their students. To repeat, these differences are not large, and are, of course, mainly impressions. The accomplishments of both school systems are similar, whether one is talking about Negro children or white, and we believe that both of these school systems are at least as good as most similar rural systems. We must also emphasize that whatever criticism we might make of these schools—and obviously many are possible—the thing that sets them apart from others in this country is not their physical arrangements, their curricula, their books, or even the professional characteristics of their teachers. What is different is the product.

We suspect many people will find this assertion hard to accept, since it is part of the widely believed American educational mythology that all educational deficiencies can be attributed to poor teaching. This is false.* We are not claiming, of course, that these schools are staffed by the cream of the crop, and we do not deny that better teachers, better books, libraries, and other facilities might, here as everywhere else, improve matters—a little at least, and maybe even a lot. But we do not believe that achievement scores of the sort shown in Table 5 can be explained this way, if for no other reason than that these schools and these teachers are not very different from those to be found elsewhere. Many cities which pay high salaries and which have adequate equipment have whole schools of students who perform no better than these children, probably for many of the same reasons, most of which depend on who the children are. The reason is plain. As we noted earlier, education takes place in a cultural context. All over this country in communities in which children are "disadvantaged"—in city slums, on Indian reservations, among migrant workers—similar achievement scores are found. The currently popular term used to describe this phenomenon in educational circles is "cultural deprivation."

Giving it a name does not solve the problem or even explain its nature. The phenomenon has drawn a great deal of attention in recent years, focusing largely on the slums of large cities. But it is not just a problem of the cities. It is not just a problem of segregation or of poverty, and it can involve a majority of the children in a community. The serious and widespread deficiencies in the educational systems of the rural South cannot be readily solved within a standard framework. The schools of a county like Burke or Edgefield could be rather easily made to be like those of one of our "good" suburban systems in all respects but one, because they are not very different now. But they cannot be made "just like" because the students are different, they belong to a different culture, and the "standard" American school is ill-suited to their needs.

This matter has been the subject of some research, but much remains to be learned in spite of the recent attention it has been getting. Although current knowledge is largely derived from research among children in city slums, it provides some clues as to what kinds of educational procedure might be effective in a rural setting.

CHAPTER III

Cultural Deprivation*

Many children in the rural Black Belt, particularly Negro children, can be classified as "culturally deprived." We assert that it is for this reason that school is so relatively unsuccessful among these children.

What do we mean (and what do we not mean) when we say that some individual is "culturally deprived"? Broadly speaking, we mean that there have been omissions and deficiencies in the background of the individual so that in comparison with the "typical" individual in the culture under consideration he has had little opportunity to acquire the knowledge, skills, and abilities needed for successful functioning in society. In particular, then, we are asserting that the skills and abilities, the knowledge and information, and, to some extent, the values that the children of the very poor rural Southerner learn in their childhood at home, especially if they are Negro, do not provide an adequate foundation for their schooling.

Note that we are not saying that such children do not acquire any knowledge, ability, or values at home. However, there is no doubt that regardless of what these children do learn at home, they do not learn—or do not learn well—those things that the standard school procedures and patterns of organization make it necessary that children know in order to progress successfully in school.

In all groups to which the label "culturally deprived" has been applied, the children start school with marked language

*The material of this section is our interpretation of the research on the topic of cultural deprivation. We have not cited this research directly but references to most of it can be found in one or more of the following:

deficits. These deficiencies usually create difficulties in school work immediately, because language skills are needed for learning to read and most schools make reading the first and foremost order of business. The child who cannot succeed reasonably promptly in learning to read almost always faces continuous failure from that point on and may quite realistically lose hope of ever having any real school success even if he does gradually learn to read a bit.

The seriousness of the consequences of this language deficiency is much clearer than its exact nature. It has traditionally been assumed that lower class children—and, in fact, all those children rating low in language proficiency—have learning problems because they do not know enough words and thus lack the concepts needed. Such views have shaped the programs offered in most schools.

Educators have known for a long time that language facility is an important factor in academic success and programs to increase the vocabularies and language skills of children are part of the curricula of all schools. For example, direct vocabulary instruction, in which children compile lists of new words and look up their meanings, has been a technique used widely for many years. These traditional approaches are not, however, a hopeful line of attack, because, in spite of the effort and ingenuity that has been put into them, they have not done the job.

It now appears that vocabulary deficiencies may not be the root of the problem. In fact, culturally deprived children often use a rather large number of words accurately. To be sure, in comparison with the middle class children, those of the lower class are not nearly so familiar with the words normally used in the school, and it is true also that these children do not know much about many of the objects and paraphernalia of middle class life in America. Television is helping to change this. Because of this they have special problems in understanding many of the things talked about in their textbooks and in relating these things to their own lives. But it should be understood that this particular sort of problem is not so much a deficit as it is a difference. It is to be sure a difference that calls for action. A child can and should read about life in other places and other cultures; but he ought to read and learn about his own as well, since that is his base of reality and the beginning of all thought. In short, this so-called deficit is in the school material and not in the child's mind.

In any case, the importance of sheer knowledge of words is not entirely clear since recent work in this area suggests that the difficulty is more subtle. It lies in the flexibility and skill children develop in their language usage. Culturally deprived children (or adults for that matter) use a language that at first blush is not very different from that of anybody else. But on closer examination it appears that they use relatively large numbers of standard expressions and cliches that fit the situation generally, but that lack precision and clarity. The symbolism used is descriptive, concrete, visual, and of a low order of generality. Nuances of feeling are expressed by non-verbal means. The language used in a given situation lacks both the variety and specificity to the situation one finds in the language of middle class children and it deals with abstract ideas relatively rarely. Although he often knows the words needed, the culturally deprived child will seldom use alternative ways of saying something even though such variations can be used to make meanings clear, to draw distinction, and to add emphasis. Instead the same standard phrasing is used over and over. In addition, hypotheses and conditional statements are infrequent, as are all indications of tentativeness and uncertainty.

It seems probable that these and related deficits carry over to listening as well as reading skills, thereby creating extra problems for these children everywhere they turn. Perhaps more than any other single thing, they need to learn to play with language meanings, to learn to get variety and nuance of meaning into their speech, to increase their appreciation and awareness of the value in the distinctions and refinements of meaning that shifts in word order and the addition of subordinate and qualifying expressions can bring. We are talking about communication and the expression of ideas, and, therefore, this training must involve speech in use, and it must be functional in the children's lives from the start;* for this it follows that practice in communicating and elaborating their own ideas, not those of others, comes first. Furthermore, this practice must be extensive in each of as many kinds and varieties of situations as possible if it is seriously to affect the thinking of children.

*We hope very much that this notion will not be read as necessarily asking for more of the pedestrian "real life" material which seems to plague our school texts. Children find poetry, fantasy, and sheer word play (e.g., nonsense rhymes) intelligible and functional in their lives.

Conversations with adults aware of the possibilities of the language and concerned with helping the child learn to use it is, it seems, the most effective way for children to learn these language skills, at least until reading becomes a prominent part of the child's life (if it ever does), and perhaps still even then. Probably this training is most effective in the early pre-school years when basic language patterns are being established.

But use of language is not the only problem. Among others, all of which are very closely related to language, there is the apparently slower perceptual development of the disadvantaged child, i.e., his more restricted awareness of the perceptual discriminations possible among many sensory dimensions, such as size and volume. These children are not likely to be taught, or rewarded, at home for learning the appropriate quantitative discriminations among objects or to attach the proper descriptive labels to objects (e.g., "tall" rather than "big," and so on). Consequently, orderly development of abstract quantitative concepts is hindered.

Relative to middle class children, lower class children tend to be concrete minded; they are oriented toward objects and direct physical action, rather than toward abstractions and conceptual manipulation. They often continue more or less indefinitely to learn through motor or physical actions; that is, they tend to persist in a mode of thinking that depends on the manipulation of objects, whereas middle class children usually begin to shift to symbolic and verbal substitutes for action sometime between the ages of ten and fourteen.

Perhaps related to this is another intellectual difference which through its effect on motivation has far reaching educational consequences. Lower class children seem to have shorter attention spans, memory, and (therefore?) what may be called anticipation span; that is, they function more with reference to immediate than distant goals. For the middle class person, long range goals are usually fairly specific in character. In contrast, in the lower class the future is regarded in more general and vague notions and for the most part is not considered as something one controls through present action. Hence, present behavior has a kind of rational relation to future goals for the middle class person which it does not have for those in the lower class. The middle class person anticipates within a broader time perspective.

That culturally deprived children do not see as clearly specific long range goals to which present behavior appears to be rationally connected helps cause what has been called the "deferred gratification pattern." They are not inclined to delay or renounce impulse gratification in favor of future gain. Future goals have a degree of reality for middle class children which they do not have for lower class children. Middle class children are exposed to more consistent patterns of rewards and punishments for impulse control and achievement. The adult models to which they are exposed day after day manifest a degree of self-discipline not generally seen in the adults with whom the lower class has close emotional ties.

Anxiety reduction is probably also a factor in the disadvantaged person's failure to manifest the deferred gratification pattern. Grinding poverty and the intense threat under which he, especially if Negro, lives is almost certain to evoke a high level of anxiety, the reduction of which is to some extent effected through impulse gratification.

Passivity in the lower class child, especially the Negro, is another facet of the motivational pattern related to achievement. One important manifestation of this passivity in the school is the child's failure to ask questions and seek clarification where it is needed. That these children should tend to be passive is not surprising. Their first hand experience most certainly does not teach them that the environment can be manipulated, controlled, and changed by anything they do. The Negro boy is likely to come to school having had no direct experience with a successful male model.

This whole pattern—the tendency to be passive, impulse-directed, and to lack motivation for achievement—is related to and perhaps rooted in the child's concepts of self. The most pernicious psychological consequence of a caste system must surely be the tendency for individuals to accept as accurate for themselves the social definitions of inferiority inherent in the system.

For example, there are a number of studies which indicate (a) that Negroes from young childhood on tend toward low self-acceptance; (b) that Negro children of pre-school age express greater preference for white than Negro children; (c) that they are later than white children in acknowledging their racial identity; and (d) the result is that at an older age level Negro students tend to judge themselves inferior to white students even in the face of objective evidence tending to contradict such judgments.

Finally, we should add that the homes of these children do not help them do well in school for other reasons. The parents don't know how to teach their children how to learn. They tend to be particularly inept as teachers of their own children (again partly a language problem). Also the homes usually lack books and there are rarely places for students to read and study in peace and quiet.

In the face of all these severe problems, an ordinary school as typically constituted at present is fighting a losing battle. These schools are organized and run on the assumption that the child had been growing in the ordinary middle class home, and that he has had the years of direct individual training that this implies. Whenever this assumption is not justified the school tends to fail.

To succeed the school needs to provide substitutes for the experiences these children lack.

1. The children need extended contact with educated adults as early as possible in their lives; the school must provide many additional opportunities for these children to converse with each other, with older children, and with adults about all kinds of things. This experience should have a degree of direction and order and lead the child in the direction of the abstract.

2. The school must also provide the deprived children with more assistance in the important pre-adolescent years. First, they need help in learning to deal with problems using abstractions, both with words and with other symbol systems; thus the school must do more than it now does to help the children shift to adult patterns of thinking. Second, the school must help the child develop long range goals. This means that he must see visible and believable steps along the way to these goals. If he is to remain in contact with his family without conflict, the older members of his family, older brothers and sisters as well as parents, must also come to believe in both the goodness and the real possibility of these goals. Third, the school must provide the child with solid evidence that effort, persistence, and self-discipline in school tasks are expected and rewarded.

3. To inculcate these attitudes and to avoid misunderstanding and conflict means that the adolescents and adults in the community must also be drawn into these efforts sufficiently both to support and at least to some degree understand the school's objectives.

CHAPTER IV

Specific Suggestions For Education

We have tried to make clear that education takes place in a social context. What schools can accomplish is tightly limited by the environment within which those schools operate. Schools of a rural slum are not likely to produce persons able to be constructive members of a community unless the school gets into the children's home and neighborhood life. It follows that an educational program which offers full opportunities for intellectual growth to all children is not possible where economic and other forms of social advancement are racially segregated. This is categorically true, we believe, for the Negro children. It is true as well for the white children, though present arrangements are much less unsatisfactory for their intellectual growth.

Education can be more successful when schools are desegregated. But only partially so, because, again, education occurs in a context, and when life and opportunities outside the school are segregated, the best efforts of schoolmen to develop the talents of students will be handicapped severely.

Even were all segregation removed in Black Belt counties, their educational problems would still be immense, because of the economic and cultural lags burdening them. We have said, therefore, that improvement of the schools along standard lines is not the answer. If the states of Georgia and South Carolina (or the United States) were to pour unstinted resources into Burke and Edgefield schools, the educational results would not be greatly different, if the added resources only helped the counties do what they are now doing better.

We have said that basic transformations of the Black Belt schools are needed, by which we mean new practices aimed at compensating for the cultural handicaps brought by the children to the school-door. Given the economics of the Black Belt, even such basic transformations cannot be expected to overcome the handicaps imposed by the environment on the children —schools cannot do everything—but in time, perhaps, they could reverse the environmental conditions, and they can, in any event, truly educate a larger proportion of the children than they now manage.

What we are going to describe here, then, will be some specific possible ways of proceeding. We do not claim that our suggestions are the prescription, but rather that they are examples of the sorts of things that are needed. In some cases, other alternatives are both possible and practical. As indicative of the kind of changes which we believe could result in more successful education in the rural South, we would suggest:

1. Nursery-kindergarten units for children ages three through five;
2. The use of boarding units for children in the middle grades (four, five, and six);
3. The employment of senior high school students in the system, so that all students from the tenth grade up who want or are interested in work will have an opportunity to earn at least $50 a month as a part of their school program;
4. An intercounty and college (or university) cooperative program involving a coordinated plan of consolidation, joint purchasing, and joint inservice and preservice teacher training programs in cooperation with the college.

Beyond these steps and out of them we would expect such things as expanded remedial reading and library services (e.g., a set of mobile reading clinics and mobile library-bookstores, selling paperback books at nominal cost, serving the associated counties), expanded guidance services, and various special education services using, in many cases, college personnel and facilities. One simple but essential step would be to insure that no child is inadequately fed (breakfast as well as free lunches should be offered) or clothed. We would also expect that Job Corps, Work Study, and Community Action Programs financed through the "poverty program" (Economic Opportunity Act of 1964) would be inaugurated. Furthermore, the school buildings should be open twelve or more hours a day; libraries and supervised study halls should be available afternoons and evenings; evening adult education programs should be offered; extensive summer programs should be developed; and so on indefinitely. We shall not describe all of these steps. Instead, we shall elaborate only the four steps suggested above.

A. The Nursery and Kindergarten Program

There is a tendency in some quarters to hold out nursery schools as a panacea for cultural deprivation; they are not that. Nevertheless, where, as in the Black Belt, the problem is the lack of educational growth in the home, there is a pressing need to get the children as early as possible into organized learning opportunities and to establish school-parent relationships. We think there should be a pre-school program for these five year olds.

This program would be aimed specifically at those coming from the poorest homes. Day-care centers and nursery schools do not necessarily prove very beneficial to children, so the nature of the program is all-important. The kind we are envisaging might be like that described by Gray and Klaus.*

Their program centered first on attitudes toward achievement; trying to increase the child's achievement motivation, his ability to persist toward a goal and to delay gratification, and to arouse interest in school-type activities such as listening to stories and looking at books. Secondly, they attempted to improve aptitudes for achievement by developing the more simple and basic concepts needed in school work, increasing perceptual discrimination, and improving language usage.

Gray and Klaus worked on number and color concepts and concepts concerning objects of the world in which they live. In addition they stressed position words and action categories, such as walk, run, jump, and hop. They tried to increase the children's abilities to recognize forms, shapes, and patterns and to discriminate among sounds, tastes, odors, and textures. In language development their major efforts consisted of encouraging the children to talk and in placing them in situations where language was necessary. The central operating feature of the program was the procedure of reinforcement. They used both concrete reinforcement, such as candy, and social reinforcement in the form of physical contact with adults: petting, hugging, and so forth. Throughout their work, particularly at the beginning, they made efforts to make sure that reinforcement of the behavior they desired was as immediate and consistent as possible. Gradually they moved away from concrete reinforcement and made efforts to develop verbal rewards as reinforcers.

A program of this sort, to be effective, calls for trained teachers and for careful planning. But if the teachers running each class thoroughly understand what it is they are trying to do they can quite readily and easily make use of assistants who are much less well-trained; high school students—both male and female—provided they receive some training related to the program, could work successfully and helpfully, to both themselves and the pupils, in such a nursery school situation. We would propose that high school students be offered a course in child care, and training as part of this course work, and that for pay—say $10 per week—they spend two three-hour periods a week acting as assistants to the teachers.* These teachers should be part of the staff of the high school course.

*Untrained adults might well be employed as aides also, and it should be evident that there are opportunities for tie-ins with adult education programs too.

A course of this sort is part of the curriculum of many high schools, but some preliminary training of all teachers would be desirable and probably easily arranged through the associated college.

Contact with parents is also essential, and one of the activities of the teachers should be to maintain it. Trained social workers should also be involved in this part of the program. Attendance of at least the three and four year olds should be a matter of parental choice. The regular teaching staff and the social workers should be the ones who reach the parents and persuade them to send their children to these schools. Having a pre-school program creates transportation problems both because of added numbers of children to carry and because these very young children should spend only three or four hours a day at school. These problems will be minimized, however, if the school system, instead of having large school buses, has a number of station wagons or smaller buses which carry maybe nine or ten children, and if carefully selected high school students be employed to drive them. For the system as a whole we would propose a large increase in the number of vehicles and a reduction in the size of their load so that the length of trips to and from school for most of the children in the system could be reduced. This would cost more money, but a fair portion of that money would go into the pockets of students in the system, and we believe that tangible economic rewards for staying in school are important for the same reasons that concrete reinforcement should be used initially in the pre-school classes.

We may finally note in passing that Gray and Klaus report gains in the I.Q.'s of the children with whom they dealt. Similar results have been obtained by a number of other researchers. But it is the nature of the program that counts, not the sheer existence of such schools. Nursery schools which are largely custodial institutions, in which the children play without a planned program of learning, do not serve any educational function and merely cost money.

B. Boarding Units

Our second suggestion is the establishment of boarding units connected with each of the elementary schools in the county. Like the preceding suggestion, this is directed primarily to the poorest children, and again its use would be voluntary and it would be necessary to gain agreement from the parents. We are proposing that children in grades four, five, and six spend three months each year in one of these boarding units, whenever the parents will agree to this.

As in the previous suggestion the important element is what is done, not the mere existence of these boarding units. Most important would be the quality of the teachers. The chance of extensive, warm, personal contact with adults who represent middle class patterns of living, thinking, and values represents one of the principal reasons for these units, since realistic models of this sort, for many of the children of the rural South, are not handy. In addition there would be the opportunity to live in an organized, stable environment in which books, music, art, and conversation are standard and valued activities.* They also would have a chance to get some intensive tutoring during this time, and could be helped with their study habits. It would be expected that each group would take a number of trips, especially to cities, since that is where many of them will in due course live.

In fact, it might be well to plan a fourth quarter in grade seven, spent at a residential unit in a city. Perhaps some cities would be willing to develop exchange programs with counties, sending children to the boarding units in the county and accepting an equal number in a unit in the city for a quarter. Three months in a city school accompanied by a careful orientation to the city might add much to the perspective of these children about the need for education. The city children could probably profit at least as much from a period of time in a rural community.

We envisage these units as having about 21 children, seven to eight from each grade, with approximately equal numbers of boys and girls. A unit would be staffed by two regular teachers who carry a partial load in that school (e.g., share classes with an intern), one male and one female, plus two intern teachers in training (one might have had some previous experience, while the other might be a beginner). In addition, from three to five high school students would be allotted to each unit each quarter to act as assistants before and after school. These students would not only be given room and board but also paid something — say $40 a month. The interns would also receive some pay, perhaps half-rate for the half-year that they would be expected to be in residence. In addition to the direct service that student assistants (drawn from the same cultural background) and interns would give, they would also provide the children with a sort of graduated series of models so that being like the — hopefully — admired and loved teacher might not seem so impossible; i.e., the children could see steps along the road and the possibility of variation. The regular school cafeteria could supply food but a dining room in the residence unit to be used for all three meals should be included in the plans. Mealtime is one of the periods of day when the kind of personal contact envisaged could be built.

The children would follow the regular school program by and large, would go home on weekends, and the teachers and interns would be expected to carry regular duties in the school. The teachers should receive a regular salary plus their room and board for these duties.* They should be required to go through a special training program offered by the associated college or university in order to hold these positions. This could lead to a hierarchy of teacher ranks justifying substantial salary differences, related to competence and responsibility rather than pure seniority and course credits. There is reason to believe that the position of teachers in these units would have substantial attraction to good young teachers and interns. Some of these interns could be in preservice training but it should also be possible to include an internship in these schools as a part of the advanced training of teachers with one or two years of experience. Further, it could result in drawing to such rural systems a quality of teacher that they have been having difficulty in finding at the present time.

There is substantial reason to believe that schools of this sort can have marked effects on students; but it is open to question whether or not the period of time suggested — three months for each of three or four years — would be adequate to accomplish these goals. However, it is believed that at the very least these schools would have positive effects on motivation of the youngsters and that they would go into junior high grades sufficiently interested in doing good work so that the school could hold them.

C. Employment of Senior High School Students in the School

The third proposal is that all interested students who are doing adequate work in the tenth grade and up have an opportunity to earn at least $10 a week as a part of their school program. By employing these students as assistants in the nursery school program, in the residential units, and as drivers, several hundred could be so employed. Other employment that would be both educational for them and a service to the school system surely could be found. It should be noted that by keeping these young people in school, competition with adults for jobs should be reduced. These activities can be of substantial educational value; in fact, the assistants in both the two programs suggested above could well turn out to be the chief beneficiaries of these programs if the school system and especially the teachers involved devote proper attention to helping these students understand what they are doing. The reason for paying the students, of course, is to provide an incentive for these adolescents to stay in school and to give them concrete representation of the fact that the community and society at large value their attendance in school. It should be noted that the school system should also have a fund to provide direct scholarship assistance to students who need it and, in special cases, without the associated duties. A school board should always remember that it costs parents money to send children to school, even though the schools do not charge tuition.

D. Intercounty Cooperation

Some problems of rural systems are simply a function of size: the system cannot justify the variety of specialized personnel and facilities that are practical in a large system where the cost can be spread over thousands of pupils. Segregation and the continued use of small, unconsolidated units obviously accentuate these problems but they will exist even if the schools are consolidated and integrated.

There should be, therefore, intercounty associations for the better coordination of school attendance areas. Once these associations are started, other cooperative ventures could develop, such as consolidated purchasing, intercounty technical service, and materials centers (audio-visual services, programmed materials, curriculum materials, professional publications, etc.). We are not talking about the consolidation of counties, but rather cooperative ventures.

Cogent reasons for intercounty consolidation and a statewide plan for it are embodied for Georgia in the recent "Peabody" report. It should be recalled, however, that children already spend more time in travel than is sound practice. Cooperation can solve this and will be needed for some children regardless of district size. School districts should not get so large and far away that the people in the district are not interested in them. The notion of local responsibility has merit because it is, potentially at least, a powerful educational force which can function to create a sense of belonging and identity in the students. This asset should not be discarded lightly.

An additional and possibly necessary feature of this intercounty cooperative association is the inclusion of a nearby teacher training institution, which probably would be necessary if the boarding units are to function in the manner we have described. What we are proposing here does not seem to us to exceed the institutional resources already available: in Georgia, for example, there are 10 public supported and 14 private colleges and universities now offering approved teacher training programs; in South Carolina, there are 4 and 13.

These colleges should establish teacher training programs analogous to the so-called internship master of arts in teaching programs now to be found at various universities around the country (e.g., Chicago, Emory, Harvard, Stanford, etc.), and some of their students should do their internship in the residential units of these counties. The colleges should also provide consultant services for the expanded remedial reading programs, guidance programs, and many other facets of both the regular and new programs. This arrangement would supply the interns and provide the school systems with a first chance at young beginning teachers as well as provide a way of obtaining special services to students and inservice training for teachers otherwise awkward to arrange. Large colleges might well become members of several such associations.

E. Is It Practical?

One immediate response to these recommendations will be assertions such as "Dreamwork," "Impractical," "It won't work," "You haven't considered. . . ," "Don't you realize that. . . ," and above all, "Too expensive." We believe these ideas can be made to work, and that the many difficulties we haven't discussed here (an endless number) can be solved, and that the product would justify the cost. This country could and should spend much more on the education of its children than is now the case. Furthermore, the cost of these proposals is high only relative to what a rural southern county now spends. It is probable that to do these things might cost twice what is now spent. Let us look at what it might cost in a county the size of Burke.

The nursery-kindergarten would add around $300 per pupil per year (early education is cheap, later on it is not) or about $250,000 a year. This figure is based on the assumption of roughly 800 pupils in a class of 20-25 students staffed by a senior teacher, a junior teacher (or a nonprofessional assistant), and two (or three) high school assistants. Each teacher would have two classes, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. This figure also is based on the assumption that present structures could be used with relatively small alterations and additions.

The boarding units might seem expensive at first glance but most of the salaries could be charged to the regular instructional budget. The staff would be carrying teaching loads in the school at about ¾ rate (two teachers and two interns carrying three classes). Consequently, the eight or nine boarding units a county the size of Burke might require would probably cost no more than $300,000 a year.

The student assistance program (beyond that accounted for in the two preceding items) would add another $300,000, assuming that about 800 students in senior high school would be earning about $10 a week. This totals $850,000. The consolidation and intercounty cooperation should at least break even since substantial efficiency would be gained.

To be cautious, and to allow for the additional steps we mentioned but have not detailed, add $250,000 more for a total of $1,100,000, a figure that is a bit under the 1964 school budget in Burke County. Since Burke spent about $265 per child in average daily attendance in 1963-64, and since we are hopefully adding about 25-30% to the average daily attendance count, the per pupil figure comes to around $400, an outrageously modest figure which is under the national median (because we are not proposing here to change the salary scale of the teachers, though probably we should).

"Where does this million plus come from?" First of all, through proper tax equalization measures and by raising assessments to a proper level (e.g., 50% of fair value), the county itself could raise much more. Furthermore, many features could be financed by state and federal funds now available; e.g., Title IV of the Civil Rights Act, the Economic Opportunity Act, the National Defense Education Act, and above all, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The colleges' costs would partly be included in their regular budget since they now train teachers; furthermore, summer and in-service institutes (summer schools for children running on shortened days offer very good teacher training possibilities) can often be financed through federal programs. Additional state funds for cooperative undertakings should be forthcoming. It does not seem fanciful to us, therefore, to expect that federal funds would (and should) play a large role in meeting this budget and that the state would add to the additional local effort. In short, we believe that suggestions as basic as ours could be adapted to most rural counties and could be financed if the community were really interested in its children's education. All of our recommendations are directed toward doing something about the problems of learning that children with certain kinds of backgrounds are likely to have. In the Black Belt South, most of these children are Negro, but that they are has nothing to do with the reasons for our recommendations.

The communities in the rural South must become genuine communities in which every person is a member with a stake in community growth and development. The educational problems of these communities ramify into the problems of the whole social and economic context. We have tried to suggest that the transformation of education in some sense calls for the transformation of a community. We think such a transformation can be brought about in the South only with the help of genuine local effort and concern. Our recommendations are based upon the belief that sound educational decisions must be directed toward bringing about the maximum development of all the children in a community and upon the belief that the maximum growth and enrichment of a community cannot be achieved unless every member of the community has, and can be led to see that he has, a real stake in the outcome of community affairs.

[1] Data are for 1963-64 for Burke County, and for 1962-63 for Edgefield County.

[2] Elementary schools in Burke vary in the number of grades in the school, but all figures are for grades 1-7 inclusive for Burke County, and grades 1-8 in Edgefield.

[3] Includes non-teaching principals.

[4] Almost all of the remainder is from the state; federal funds are not important in the budgets of these systems, especially in Burke County.

[5] The difference between the counties largely represents two factors: teacher-pupil ratios and its teacher scales, for the periods considered. It may be noted that Georgia has one scale whereas S. C. has scales that depend on scores on the National Teacher Exam, a test emphasizing verbal facility. Negro teachers tend to score low on this test.

INTRODUCTION

IN 1960, THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, the Southeastern Office, American Friends Service Committee, and the Department of Racial and Cultural Affairs, National Council of the Churches of Christ, published a report on five years of violent reaction to the 1954 Supreme Court school decision, "Intimidation, Reprisal and Violence in the South's Racial Crisis." Since then, the Council and others have continued to record and report this most disgraceful aspect of the South's struggle to overcome its worst mistakes. With the same sense of sadness and urgency, this report continues the story—with its warning to the nation that violence has not abated, and that the miracle of non-retaliation from Negroes cannot be expected to continue.

Assistance of the American Friends Service Committee in preparation of research materials for this report is acknowledged. Research and writing of the project was by Mrs. Glenda Bartley of the Southern Regional Council research staff.

The following paragraph from the 1960 report is fully applicable to the situation six years later:

> Finally, this is not a comprehensive survey of southern reactions . . . It describes only their angry, violent side. Another accounting could be given of patience, responsibility, courage, and good will by both Negroes and whites. Though this aspect of the South is not in view in the report, it is an authentic and undimmed face of the South, to which each of the sponsoring agencies has paid tribute more than once. But we feel an obligation to call attention to the dangers posed by the record that follows—dangers for which all of us, through silence or inaction, must share the responsibility.

PART I

The South's Temper, 1964-1966

The South's Temper, 1964-1966

As Negro children began what some newspapers termed "massive" integration of southern public schools in September, 1965, the nation was surprised that Southerners accepted the change in a peaceful manner. The truth is that conditions in the South were neither integrated nor peaceful. Between five and six per cent of the region's 3,014,025 Negro school-age children attended classes with whites, and often these children and their parents paid a very high price for the experience. Men and women who were already desperately poor were evicted from sharecropper's cabins or tenant farms. Many without the training for good jobs lost the meager ones they had held for years. Some were beaten and shot at. Others saw their children abused and imprisoned. Yet the headlines continued to reassure the nation that "School Integration Continues to Spread Quietly Across the South."

There are several reasons for the nation's misunderstanding of the South's condition.

Passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964 indicated to many whites that the Negro's problem was now largely solved and, with restrictions barring him from participation in American life removed, he would disappear into the mainstream and quit pestering their consciences.

Immediate effects of the 1964 law were felt only in the area of public accommodations, giving middle class Negroes access to peripheral trappings of the white man's world, which were at best merely a symbol of the law's intent. The fall and winter of 1964 confirmed the fact that many urban and some rural public accommodations were desegregated.

Then, in the spring of 1965 the Office of Education announced plans to bring southern schools into compliance with the law. Virtually all districts filed plans with the federal bureau stating that various grades were open to both races, usually on a "freedom of choice" basis. Somehow the fact that in the immediate past cities had submitted to token integration only after lengthy court battles was overlooked, and it was assumed that federal money and southern honor would do the trick in the small towns and country areas.

So, when school opened in the fall, little communities like Ruby, South Carolina, which completely desegregated all twelve grades, and Philadelphia, Mississippi, which admitted a few Negro children without a riot, received national attention. The impression was false and the apathy was national, not southern. The old patterns of resistance were still being employed; wherever weakness was found in federal enforcement it would be exploited.

Soon, the federal government discovered that freedom of choice in many communities was a cruel misnomer. Negro parents who filled out transfer forms for their children (from which the Office of Education deduced the number of children in desegregated schools) often changed their minds. In many cases schools reported peacefully desegregated on the first day of classes had only a fraction of the children who had signed letters of intent—usually because the superintendent had advised Negro parents to keep their children home or send them to the Negro school until any possibility of trouble abated. Once school opened "without incident" the matter was no longer "news." Many people subjected to violence, intimidation, or economic reprisal live in isolated rural areas or small communities, and the "news" did not get out. It spoke its own language, however, to the local Negroes.

Rationale of Retaliation

At the same time the nation was deluding itself about southern school desegregation, it was ignoring the economic and occasionally violent reprisals which followed in the wake of voter registration drives.

The Voting Rights Law of 1965 was the first supplement to the Civil Rights Act. Again, once the law was passed, it seemed the issue was settled. Law created fact, and all those people for whom the Selma march spoke would now be citizens. That hundreds of people in Black Belt counties in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana were out of work or off the land because they registered to vote was hardly noticed. The deeper implications of joblessness, poverty, and frustration attached to this evidence of economic dependence were largely ignored.

The nation also has regarded violence as a characteristic of all the former Confederate states. This is an illusion. Violence has for several years been largely confined to the Deep South, and there generally to Alabama, Mississippi, north and delta Louisiana, and southwest Georgia. Occasional outbursts in the peripheral South, Texas, Arkansas, Florida, north Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, North and South Carolina, have been isolated incidents and not a manifestation of organized resistance. Though cities like Birmingham are hardly distinguishable from the surrounding countryside, the hard-core violent resistance areas are largely rural.

Here registrars know the Negroes who try to register and the jobs they hold on the plantations they "belong" to. A superintendent knows the mother hopefully filling out a transfer form for her child is a maid in the house just down the street. There also is, as one Mississippian put it, the "lack of a public sector"—a place where both races have traditionally met in an impersonal manner. In cities the buses may have had segregated seating customs but Negro and white at least rode on the same bus bound for destinations unknown to each other. The city affords (and in the case of the Negro, demands) anonymity. In the small town and rural areas, any contact between the races is a personal one, and so more painful when one tries to change patterns.

Perhaps this partially explains the real personal grudge many rural whites have against Negroes. It is not just against those who are, for reasons unknown to whites, out in the streets demonstrating for what they choose to call freedom, but against those who aren't. For those who continue to crop for Mr. John and stay out of trouble, they feel contempt. True, the wrath of whites is almost always directed at those Negroes who are trying to change things, but relationships also deteriorate with those who do not join the effort. So there is no foundation of respect, anywhere. Along with this is the feeling on the part of the white man that he is trapped, just as the Negro is trapped, in a situation over which he has no control. He reads and hears daily that only the Negro receives federal help for his predicament, and southern education is sufficiently deficient that he has no facts with which to refute this.

Having swapped the ballot for racial shibboleths, he sees democracy once again passing him by; this time as a vehicle for the very people he sacrificed so much to "keep down." Feeling beleaguered, cornered, and contemptuous, such whites permitted or abetted continued efforts to use legal, economic, and ultimately, violent methods of denying a whole people self-respect.

Plight of the Poor

Heightening the frustrations of all the rural South is the fact that cotton continues to decline as a significant portion of agricultural production. Again the peripheral South is different, having already begun to diversify its farm production and move toward industrialization in the 1940's. The Deep South—Black Belt Alabama and the Mississippi Delta particularly—have been much slower in abandoning cotton. Yet here, too, unmarketable short staple cotton and curtailed allotments, cattle, pine trees—along with mechanization have pushed people off the land. As a single staple economy wrenches itself toward a mature, diversified one, the need for unskilled labor sharply increased.

In the traditional sense these people are beyond the definition of cybernation—men and women whose one skill is bending over a hoe or a cotton stalk, who have been trained in this capacity since childhood, whose schools close in planting and pickin' time to resume in "slack" seasons. They themselves are products of the plantation system—of a feudalism that transcends the old manorial concept and becomes almost a familial relationship, with the plantation manager, the Man, a patriarch. That this patriarch might be benign and allow his docile children to remain on the land long after their usefulness has gone is often true. But once they threaten his dominion, he punishes them simply by removing them, cutting them off from their inheritance, which is the land, the hoe, and the cotton stalk.

Many of the disinherited are like the 82-year-old man whose mother was born a slave on the Wilcox County farm he was forced to leave. In his new home without water or light, he will live by "growing some corn." In West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, a woman, blind, crippled, born a slave, will live in a shanty with relatives. Another man and his wife, living on $33 a month social security, are homeless after registering to vote. Driven off the land they had farmed for decades, these people's resolve was best expressed in one old woman's pathetically stubborn defiance: "Our only sin was wanting to be citizens . . . . Would I go back to my old house if I would promise not to vote? Chile, I wouldn't promise not to vote if they gave me the house."

Retaliation against younger families began in September and usually hinged on their attempts to exercise "freedom of choice" in school desegregation. During October, November, and December the cause was voter registration. The crops were in and the people, old men and women, young families, had to go.

A family in Bolivar County, Mississippi, which had always increased its cash yield by following the mechanical cotton picker to glean what it missed, watched the "picker" drag a disc, plowing their cotton under. The truck which used to pick women up to take them to the fields "didn't stop at their houses any more." Men who had held jobs for over ten years suddenly were demoted or fired. A man lost his job with the Alabama Power Company after enrolling his child in a "desegregated" school; the county was holding up his unemployment check. A Thomas County, Georgia, man lost his job and his land after transferring his children to a "white" school. Women lost their jobs as domestics and their husbands could no longer find work as handymen. Many, like an evicted sharecropper who said of the plantation owner, "He's had a mechanical picker since '55, and he has lots of people who ain't registered working," forfeited their livelihoods for their challenge to paternalism.

All over the old recalcitrant part of the South families lost their land and their homes for registering to vote or for transferring their children. More than a hundred families in Wilcox and Lowndes Counties, Alabama, at least a hundred people in West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, and uncounted numbers of families in Bolivar, Issaquena, Sharkey, and Washington Counties, Mississippi, were put off the land. Though many of these evictions were punitive, reduced acreage allotments under the Agricultural Act of 1965 were to take a far greater toll. An estimated 4,706 seasonal workers in the Mississippi Delta alone would not be needed in 1966. These people will join the already staggering number of unemployed in the state. Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman in December, 1965, stated that "the Mississippi welfare agency estimates that as many as 500,000 more needy persons will be added to the regular winter case load of about 300,000." Mississippi's total population is only 2,178,174. That 800,000 (or 36.7%) of this number were scheduled to receive some form of public assistance indicated the magnitude of the problem.

Tent cities in Issaquena and Washington Counties in the Delta and in Lowndes County, Alabama, housed the dispossessed. In one of the coldest winters in Delta memory people huddled inside the tents, unable to find work, waiting for federal food commodities that would hold off hunger while they tried to keep from freezing. Too many times the food got tangled in red tape and the hope of its arrival turned to bitterness.

Secretary Freeman had assured the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches that money would be available "soon" for Operation Help (an experimental commodities program set up under contract between state officials, the Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Department of Agriculture).

A spokesman for inhabitants of a tent city near Tribbett, Mississippi, recounted more than a year's frustrating efforts to get commodities distributed to additional poverty-stricken people in the state. Each time a private organization within a county offered to finance and staff distribution centers for the food, the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. Immediately after the state bureau set up a commodity program in one such county the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another, the Food Stamp program was substituted. Food stamps must be purchased; a dollar stamp will buy six dollars worth of food (the figure represents the national average); so the very poor were not helped at all by the program. Finally a state-wide plan was initiated under which the Welfare Department was to get 24 million dollars worth of additional commodities from the Agriculture Department and 1.6 million dollars from the Office of Economic Opportunity to distribute food to 500,000 people for six months.

In the old system conditions under which vital food commodities were distributed, when they were distributed, were described by a Delta woman:

> "To live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then in November when they start qualifying you for the commodities, they say you got to find out how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

In many rural areas county welfare or other administrative boards have refused to accept federal food and money. In Washington County, Mississippi, where the greatest number of people are off the land and out of work, the board of supervisors refused additional government surplus commodities because (in the words of a Delta newspaper) "the program would probably benefit primarily Negroes, and landowners are said to feel they would have more difficulty in getting spring labor if commodities were not cut off in March."

Earlier in that county, in desperation, a group of about 50 of the dispossessed had left their tents and taken up residence briefly in an abandoned air base near Greenville. This adroit demonstration brought the nation's attention at last to the plight of Mississippi's poor Negroes generally, or at least to the surface of their problems.

The federal government responded in its traditional manner—by, as a spokesman for the Office of Economic Opportunity's Rural Task Force said, "putting the problem in the same category with Watts, trying to head off trouble." It undertook a labor survey in the Delta and activated the long-promised, dormant 25.6 million dollar surplus program in the state, "the most massive food distribution program since the depression." If the commodities program were stop-gap, presaging more constructive action, it would be welcome relief. But there was the impression that thirty years after the depression, federal remedies for hunger and broken lives and hopelessness had not changed. People who needed the best, most imaginative programs society could muster still got commodities—subsistence—"the dole."

There was not much chance that such palliatives could do more than keep the mass of people alive while buying off moderate leadership. Caesar's old desire for fat folks around him had not changed.

As a matter of policy the poverty program brings together in local administrative agencies whites and Negroes of all classes. While this is perhaps a noble blueprint intention, it has the effect in such a state as Mississippi of putting intransigent whites in a position to block the kind of change which the program is designed to facilitate.

The poverty program had indicated a shift in emphasis on the part of the federal government toward solutions to the fundamental problem of dependence, of economic vulnerability. It came before massive demonstrations demanded it. But it has not as yet reached those who most desperately need it, and its effect has been in all too many instances one of heightening frustrations. This adds another dimension to the problem of government's role in the Negro's struggle: In the event of massive protest or outright riots by poor people the government's traditional approach of enacting a law that answers the surface needs and quiets the protesters will be less easy, since such a law already exists. So again—the need for strong enforcement and implementation is at the crux of the problem. A reappraisal of this essential aspect of government programs as they affect the Negro community is vital if the nation is to have an answer for outbursts such as Watts which seem almost inevitable in the immediate future.

The poverty program had promised to do more than "dole"—to allow poor people themselves to launch an attack on poverty by means of increasing their own training and exposing themselves to at least a smattering of middle class culture and values. Yet it has failed in many instances to provide even the stop-gap measures such as commodities to fill immediate needs of those who are desperately poor. Its effect was to deepen the disillusionment of people like those in Mississippi who said:

> "You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin' but needs . . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples. We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration [at the Greenville air base]. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."
> "I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.
> "We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

Self-Help

To a few, "building for ourselves" had gone beyond the immediacy of a tent city to establishment of cooperatives aimed at breaking the chains of economic dependence. Cooperatives, producing everything from candles to furniture, handbags, quilts and clothing, faced many difficulties. Tools, teachers, and money were badly needed. Without capital, and long-term capital at that, most cooperatives were doomed. Outlets for products were hard to find; often they were either "sympathy" markets which are quickly exhausted or sophisticated ones that require a broad financial base for participation. Cooperatives which foster communal arrangements run the risk of becoming another Koinonia (an integrated communal farm in south Georgia which was under siege for several years). The co-ops held out hope for a way to those desperately in need of it and so were in danger of increasing bitterness and frustration if the effort failed.

At the same time, they also fostered a spirit of organization that does not die with the failure.

Self-respect on the part of Negroes is at the heart of all efforts to improve their status within the community and the nation. For people who have lost all hope and confidence (and this would include many whose pathetically small educational experience has stifled verbalization rather than enhanced it) self-respect can come from another's interest and respect. That civil rights organizations stress the beauty and worth of each individual has had a large part in instilling self-respect in people whom society as a whole has literally forgotten. To men and women who have had their identities absorbed into a system more ruthlessly dehumanizing than modern industrial society, being valued by another person can be a real beginning toward self-respect. The co-ops have much the same effect, producing tangible objects that are sources of pride. In a real sense the Tribbett tent city, set up to provide homes for striking Delta laborers, while failing to provide a permanent solution to the complex problems of jobless, homeless people, was a rallying point for all the Delta's dispossessed. All across the South, aggressive county "Improvement Leagues" and "Christian Associations" are evidence of Negroes' new awareness of their power.

Half a century after Booker T. Washington's "self-improvement" plan, the poorest Negro's chance of sharing in the South's "new prosperity" was so remote that even the hard-won ballot was often a cruel joke. If the voter's league succeeded in conquering white dominance and taking over a county—what then? Where would the money come from to pave the roads candidates promised would be paved?

To desegregate rural schools may solve the immediate problem, but those schools remain the worst in the nation. Many rural counties do not now afford the minimum matching funds states require. It is prosaic but nonetheless true that nascent efforts toward tax equalization may be the most far-reaching gain for rural Negroes yet devised. But virtually every tax case must be fought long and bitterly in the courts, holding in abeyance any hope that Wilcox, Lowndes, and like counties can be governed at all.

In struggling with these problems newly formed Negro organizations are confronted with the old vestiges of protest, of negativism, and with a growing bitterness and real alienation from American life. Woven into these organizations is a new radicalism which, on the surface, wants no part of the white man's consensus, daring the Negro to go his own way—to, as Charles Silberman said in Fortune (November, 1965), "stop pounding on the door" and, in effect, "tear the house down." Some groups are torn between the tempting chauvinism of their own political slate, which proves their strength, and merger with white "moderates" who are willing to yield to the most superficial of their demands in order to manipulate that power. This presents Negroes with a dilemma that must be faced by the nation as a whole.

The dilemma is an American reflection of a world-wide pattern in which the poor, colored, economically underdeveloped, rural world is seeking fundamental changes in the face of the status quo-oriented world of rich, white, urbanized Europe and North America—all fostered by industrialization, creating "haves" in cities, by-passing shabby "have-nots" on the land. Until recently people in the countryside were never organized.

The Populists came closest in the past, close enough to put a permanent fear into southern Bourbons—fear that lower class whites and Negroes might actually cooperate to throw off Bourbon rule. That fear operates today. So far there has been little actual political cooperation between the races, except in border states like Texas where the Negro population is comparatively small and increasingly urban. There labor, Negroes, Latin Americans and white liberals struggle toward an effective coalition. But Texas has a degree of primitive political sophistication that removes it from the southern arena. In the South generally the lower class white has absorbed enough of the shibboleths, looks forward to a share in the "new prosperity," and finds such psychological value in feeling superior to the Negro that it has been difficult to forge a class awareness. He may, however, come to vote with Negroes on some issues without really meaning to. These people still feel a link with the upper class power structure because of color, rejecting alliance with the Negro for economic reasons. That this further isolates the Negro goes without saying.

Answering Anger

Urban Negroes are cut off from all but the most impersonal contact with whites. They are crowded into slums in the city's core surrounded by housing project palisades, ringed by white suburbia. Until very recently urban Negroes have been poorly organized, venting their frustration on other Negroes. Now radicalism of the same tonal quality as the rural brand has permeated city organizations, directing the rebellion outward. In the past the only attention-getter that produced results was demonstrations. But outside of isolated picketing of a slum-lord's home or sporadic rent strikes, there is a troublesome realization that the negativism of protest can only call attention to the problem and has little to do with fundamental solutions. In one large city slum, civil rights groups and unaffiliated interested citizens have worked for more than a year to organize effective self-help projects that reach people untouched by the poverty program. The efforts met with limited success until early February when an old man froze to death in an unheated shack. Out of this and other instances of people wretchedly cold, hungry, and hopeless came picketing and rent strikes, and the threat that the slum could become another Watts.

Young liberal idealists who have worked to organize the community have themselves been challenged by the new mood of anger and rebellion. People evicted for participating in a rent strike gathered around a campfire which was the only warmth for families living in hastily erected tents. Out of this meeting came the new voice, the new challenge and the old weapon: "Why don't we 'accidently-on-purpose' burn all these damn houses down?" Young men and women, Negro and white, who had recently seemed radical suddenly became the "moderates," arguing against the burning and the destruction of a white-owned grocery store and white-run Bible center in the area. They came away knowing that their victory was a new form of tokenism—violence grudgingly held in abeyance.

In abdicating responsibility for the lives of Negroes held in slums or in feudal conditions on the land, the white South may already have thrown away its chance to direct the new explosive energy that is feeding on Negro discontent. It has cut itself off from the slums. It has, through "welfare," paid poor Negroes (and, incidentally, whites) to stay off the middle class streets and out of sight. If there is any possibility for whites to regain any voice in the Negro community, they will have to forsake their solidarity, cease bloc voting, and above all work diligently to break the cycle of segregated housing, poor schools, and menial jobs. City governments would have no choice but to deal realistically with the causes of discontent rather than with hand-picked middle class Negro negotiators.

Until recently the great mass of Negroes living in poverty in city slums has been cut off from middle class Negroes, who emulated their white counterparts. The same thing was true politically—in rare instances when a Negro was elected to public office he usually joined the white power structure as soon as it made room for him. Now there is a new middle class mood of resentment, which matches in spirit if not in depth the folk consciousness of rural radicalism.

Reasons for this resentment are obvious. Middle class Negroes, virtually the only ones touched so far by federal legislation, have found progress toward tangible results of equal opportunity frustratingly slow. There is a new awareness that even the first "easy" gains—simply peeling off the old dead layers of institutionalized prejudice—took ten years. To struggle so long just to see two prominent civil rights leaders' children in one elementary school or seven middle class Negroes join the Georgia House while an outspoken representative of lower class Negro radicalism was denied his seat on grounds that he disqualified himself by rashly-worded opposition to the Vietnam war—to buy tokenism at too high a price—has at last worn patience thin. Finally, too, successful middle class Negro politicians are becoming aware of the wishes and race consciousness of their overwhelmingly poor constituency. Typical of this new voice in southern politics was the conservative, newly-elected Negro alderman of Atlanta who warned whites that Negroes in the heart of the city would no longer honor the traditional Negro-upper class white alliance which had agreed on an annexation balance and had at the same time assured control by paternalistic whites. Affirming that Negroes might soon control the city because of the white flight to the suburbs, the alderman speculated on Negroes' control of such vital services as electric power and water as an effective method of bargaining with white suburbia. He urged a fair housing law as a realistic remedy.

All levels of government must deal realistically with this new determination to negotiate from strength rather than rely on the old appeal to white conscience. Whites, too, must realize that in many ways the psychological condition of Negroes generally is similar to that of the middle class and peasantry in France prior to the revolution. The first feeble gains, opening the door just wide enough to let those outside look at life inside, have spurred a greater desire to participate in that life; at the same time frustration with lagging progress tempts the outsiders to destroy it . . . .

Federal Response

To many it has seemed that the nation's response to Negroes' needs has been unimaginative. And most efforts to implement existing laws have met with limited success. In the case of both the Civil Rights and Voting Acts, government action came as a response to protest by organized groups, and, though their effects were far from complete, they stilled the protest. There is every indication that the government will react in the same manner to continued violence against civil rights workers in the South. But this is merely a surface response—a sort of negation of negativism. Little actual headway can be made until Negroes in the South are less economically vulnerable and thus less subject to that method of intimidation. There is an incredibly tenacious determination on the part of poverty stricken people, particularly in rural areas, to give their children a chance for a better education. But loss of a job requires that people sustain themselves and their determination over what seems an endless time. Thus this form of reprisal is often more effective than a bombing or a beating. Violence often merely strengthens the will and in many cases unites a whole community where other attempts at unity have failed. And yet the violence persists, and does have its deadly effectiveness, if not directly any more, then in subconscious ways that limit Negro options and initiatives.

One of the strongest moves toward better enforcement of the civil rights law was the tightening of guidelines for school desegregation by the Office of Education for fall, 1966, school openings. But the test of this new strength was yet to come.

In a letter asking Negro parents voluntarily to send their children to segregated schools in spite of a Justice Department-initiated suit seeking desegregation of the system, Wilcox County, Alabama, school officials invoked the old reminder that one day the Yankee would tire of idealism, as he had in the past, abandoning the Negroes once again to the white South: "The people of this county will, in all probability, have to continue to live here in this county together after the influences from without have ceased. It is best for all if they can do so in a mutual spirit of good will."

One recalcitrant county in a state notorious for defiance should not be treated as a curiously rebellious mutant in an otherwise acquiescent region. At almost the same time that Wilcox County sounded its primitive warning, Deep South public officials were protesting the sudden, drastic nature of the Office of Education's new guidelines requiring pupil desegregation beyond tokenism and a start toward faculty integration. Twelve years after the Brown decision, feigned shock and overt defiance were not yet isolated phenomena and the violence hinted at in the Wilcox letter is still very much a factor to be reckoned with by people who defy custom in the "hard-core" South.

There have been ten killings, uncounted beatings, burnings, bombings, and shootings since that "peaceful" school desegregation began in September, 1965. Yet the result will never again be the old fearful withdrawal. And, though the violence is largely rural, it is felt in the city more keenly now than ever before. Though Negroes have for some time been moving into cities and all major civil rights organizations except the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee operate chiefly from city bases, the emotional center of the civil rights movement remains in places like Lowndes County, scene of two civil rights slayings, and a symbol of the Movement is unpunished brutalization of Negroes in such places. Now a "civil rights assassin" who gets off with a stern reprimand by the judge and a hearty handshake from his cohorts may trigger widespread violent reprisal by Negroes in city slums and on the land. A Negro "moderate's" outrage that his brother's killer escaped without even the reprimand prompted his rejection of any possibility of dealing peacefully with whites: "We'll have to lay and wait for them all night, and fight with them all day . . . . No Negroes are free until all Negroes are free. No one can free us but ourselves. . . . It's time to start killing."

Throughout accounts of the white South's violence there runs a new thread of Negroes' fearlessness and determination—and a warning: "I've been stomped down and stomped down all of my life. It's been long enough."

* * * * * * * *

Behind misleading headlines and misconceptions about orderly progress in the South were complexities long familiar.

In the first place, since 1954 and before, reaction to federal court decrees and law affecting segregation had been of three kinds—a grudging, but good faith acceptance, an effort to evade through administrative delay and cheating, and all-out resistance with violence and terroristic intimidation and reprisal. All three reactions could and did occur in all eleven states. Some states, like Tennessee, were characterized by a predominance of the first; some, like Virginia and South Carolina, by a predominance of the second; and some, like Alabama and Mississippi, by a predominance of the third. These were old familiar configurations in the South.

The pattern of reaction to the 1964 civil rights law was essentially this same three-way split. If there was any cause for rejoicing, it was in that at least in its official stance, the government of such a state as Mississippi was no longer encouraging all-out, violent resistance. But there was no overnight change in the South in attitude or patterns of compliance, with the overnight change of the law.

Nor was there any change in one of the oldest truths regarding these three southern reactions to the will of the nation. The resistance would be attempted, grow, and persist to the degree that the enforcement arms of the federal government allowed it. Full enforcement, as it has always been, was possible. It was not forthcoming.

Two other pieces of federal legislation promised a permanent solution to this old problem of enforcement. One was the pledge of the Johnson Administration in 1965 to enact new laws to strengthen southern institutions of justice, and to protect persons exercising constitutional rights from southern lawlessness. The other was the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which promised eventual development of Negro political power sufficient to demand compliance, and an end of lawless violence.

Out of these forces—poverty, continued white resistance, less than full federal enforcement, resultant disillusionment—and out of the new psychological state of Negro Americans (their unwillingness to settle for anything less than full citizenship) was coming something new in the South. It could destroy whatever hopefulness there was in the situation for the kind of transformation the nation seemed to think had already come. Or it could be another catalyst to force the nation and the white South yet another turn in the torturous facing about to full intellectual honesty in dealings with Negroes.

This most compelling factor has to do with the mood of answering anger, of retaliatory violence among Negroes of the South, and the threat in the cities, particularly, of rampage and riot, echoing the legacy of white lawlessness so long the South's greatest disgrace. The anger itself is not new, nor the fear among white Southerners that it will be unleashed. Only the signs that the anger is closer to the surface, nearer to exploding, are new. That it has not exploded in the past is but a dim hope that it will not explode in the future. Unless the realization of promises and potential can be speeded—this seems about the only hope.

But the worst excesses of the ugly side of the South have always had a counterpoint, however faint, of a relation between the races more truly representative of the American ideal than anywhere else. In the shifting patterns of public and private life in the South, forces are at work which encourage this better side of the South more than they have ever before been encouraged. The forebodings current in 1965-66 among those who know the region best in many ways suggest darkness before dawn. It is important to know, though, that the new day is not yet here.

Greenville, MISSISSIPPI

Delta Ministry Reports, February, 1966.

Median income for plantation Negroes in the Delta is $456. Because of mechanization and a one-third crop allotment reduction, the state employment service estimates that 4,706 of the 18,124 seasonal workers living with their families on plantations in the Delta will not be needed to work next year.

Of those already off the land and out of work, living in tent cities and abandoned shacks along the Delta, about 50 entered the unoccupied Air Force base at Greenville January 31. Some thirty hours later they were forced to move out by air police.

Following what for many of them was just another eviction, three spokesmen of the group held a press conference in the Delta Ministry office in Greenville. Out of this conference came specific grievances, resentments, frustrations, and anger, and a real sense of alienation from American society.

"I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.

"We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

". . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples.

"We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."

". . . The building was more respectable than poor hungry peoples with nothing and nowhere to go. If the peoples was satisfied and willing to sit there to find ways to do for themselves, the government should have let them stay there. The building was more important than poor folks . . . .

"The only reason . . . for eviction was that the building that we was in didn't have running water and didn't have any type of fire protection. And see I know that the federal government can't tell me that was the reason we was put out, because all over Mississippi houses don't have running water or fire protection."

A spokesman for the Delta Ministry recounted over a year's frustrating effort to get commodities distributed to poor people in the state. Each time a group within the county offered to distribute commodities the Department of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. In one instance immediately after the state department set up a commodity program the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another county the Food Stamp program was initiated. The Food Stamp program costs individuals money, so the very poor were not helped by it. Under a state-wide plan the welfare department is to get 24 million dollars worth of commodities from Agriculture and 1.6 million dollars from OEO to distribute food to 500,000 for six months. The food was due to be ready for distribution January 23. "When that day came we could not find (any) food being given out. And now it's February."

"I'd like to add to that to live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then . . . when they start qualifying you for commodities, they say you got to find our how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

". . . See, if you belong to any civil rights group or participate, they tell you you can't get a job with the poverty program, because that's political and you know, you can't have that. And that's what's happening with the poverty program: It's political — that's the reason it's not doing anything for the poor."

". . . You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin but needs. That's why we was pulled off that building that wasn't being used for anything. We is ignored . . . The thing about property upset them, but the thing about poor people don't. So there's no way out but to begin your own beginning, whatever way you can. So far as I'm concerned, that's all I got to say about the past. We're beginning a new future:

". . . Because of the fact that we was refused by the government and evicted, it's important that we start planning our own government."

Headline: "CIVIL RIGHTS WORKERS MAKE VIOLENT THREAT"

"A band of young civil rights workers say they intend to shoot back if their 'Freedom House' is again made the target of nightriders."

One of the college students living in the house was nicked by pellets on February 2, when a carload of "nightriders" pumped five shotgun blasts into it. The students had been keeping watch in the house since New Year's Eve, when someone tried to burn it down.

Elba, ALABAMA

Montgomery Advertiser 2/26/66. Dateline: Elba.

A blast triggered by ten sticks of dynamite ripped through one wing of Elba High School, where two Negro students entered the eleventh and twelfth grades last fall. Two hundred people had just left the building following a banquet, but authorities said there were no Negroes in the crowd.

Members of the Second Howitzer Battalion of the 117th Artillery in Elba "will have 35 men on duty . . . throughout the weekend to preserve evidence relating to the bombing."

Neshoba County, MISSISSIPPI

Delta Democrat-Times 2/21/66. Dateline: Neshoba County, (UPI).

A small Mennonite church, burned in 1964 during investigation of the murders of three civil rights workers, was dynamited Feb. 19.

Sunflower County, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Daily News 2/3/66.

"A representative of the Sunflower County Colored Baptist Assoc. filed suit . . . in Hinds County Court against four civil rights organizations and their directors in connection with the burning of a church March 5, 1965 . . . .

"In the declaration . . . (the representative) said, the defendants began renting the church July 24, 1964, with the purpose of achieving full and complete integration of Negro citizens into the political and economic life of the state of Mississippi.

"Shortly after the organizations moved into the building, the Sunflower County Colored Baptist Assoc. was notified that its fire insurance policy had been canceled due to the fact that the property was being used for a different purpose than it was when the policy of insurance was issued. The association then found out that no insurance company was willing to insure the property."

Birmingham, ALABAMA

Birmingham News 2/23/66. Dateline: Birmingham.

Authorities discovered a "time-bomb factory," which they think may lead them to the "Birmingham Bombers" who terrorized the city early in 1965.

The county sheriff said the time bombs were "made and set out by members of an organization. He did not identify the organization."

Prattville, ALABAMA

Southern Courier 2/19-20/66. Dateline: Prattville.

A Negro youth was beaten by "at least a dozen" white boys as he was repairing his car at a service station. He was arrested, and, "while in the car . . . he said that someone would get even with his attackers.

"The next thing he knew he was belted over the head again.

"The youth was rushed to the hospital, treated, and released . . . . "

He was "charged with resisting arrest and released on bond."

Zachary, LOUISIANA

The New York Times 2/8/66. Dateline: Zachary (UPI).

"A Negro's house was bombed last night, the fourth such mysterious explosion involving Negroes since last summer in the Baton Rouge areas."

Forest, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Daily News 2/1/66. Dateline: Jackson (AP).

"A retired Negro school teacher has said his Forest, Miss., home was riddled with gunfire a week ago on the eve of the desegregation of two Forest schools."

Jackson, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Clarion-Ledger-Daily News 2/13/66. Dateline: Jackson.

"With one dissenting vote, the Senate passed a tightly written bill making it a felony for any person to fire a deadly weapon into a residence or other inhabited structure.

"The offense is currently classed a misdemeanor and carries a light fine and lighter jail sentence. The existing statute is so loosely written that it has occasionally led law officers in rural areas to laugh off volleys of gunshots fired into homes if no injury is reported.

"Officers have been prone to assume the negativistic attitude that since the offense is a misdemeanor, why bother to conduct a full-fledged investigation? A conviction, they have reasoned, would hardly be worth the time, effort and expense consumed by a thorough probing.

"This unfortunate fact, coupled with a barrage of civil rights activity in the state, has triggered the imagination of certain groups of people. The result has been a number of incidents in which nightriders fire upon the homes of persons they do not see eye to eye with."

Morven, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News and Observer 3/3/66. Dateline: Morven (AP).

A white Methodist minister who set up a Negro Bible school near Morven, said he was being transferred to a church in Mecklenburg County because he feared "violence to my family."

"He said the first sign of any objection to the Bible school came in January when he found what appeared to be a bullet hole in the rear of his station wagon . . . .

"He said his family had received numerous telephone calls, some sympathetic, some curious and some objectionable."

Atlanta, GEORGIA

Atlanta Constitution 2/25/66. Dateline: Atlanta.

The mayor of Atlanta and a young Negro "exchanged heated words Thursday night over whether Negroes living in Atlanta slums will stage a Watts-type riot here to improve their lot.

" 'Atlanta may have some violent disorders as we've seen in Watts,' warned . . . a spokesman from the Vine City Council.

" 'Your statement in my opinion is totally erroneous,' " the major retorted.

After being warned that "Negroes in Atlanta are getting anxious . . . . the mayor repeated, " 'I say to you again, there won't be another Watts in Atlanta. It'll have to happen over the top of me and a couple of other people I know.' "

The mayor then went on to discuss water pollution, finances and the police department.

Irvington, NEW JERSEY

Delta Democratic-Times 2/21/66. Dateline: Irvington (UPI).

The NAACP field director from Mississippi, "brother of slain Medgar Evers, Sunday called for a violent answer to violence in the South."

He "claimed there were 32 unsolved civil rights deaths in Mississippi since the death of his brother, June, 1964.

"He said the FBI and the Justice Dept. 'had no intention of bringing justice' to the murderers of his brother, formerly the NAACP field director in Mississippi.

" 'It's time to start killing,' . . . (he) said. 'I will do all that I have to do so that Medgar is avenged.'

"He told his audience the violence of the Ku Klux Klan and the nightriders would have to be answered by violence.

" 'We'll have to lay and wait for them at night, and fight with them all day,' he said. 'No Negroes are free until all Negroes are free. No one can free us but ourselves.' "

FOREWORD

It is difficult, if not impossible, to be completely accurate in brief statements about economic principles, which must fit a variety of circumstances, without making more elaborate explanations. Most texts on this subject are rather bulky volumes of several hundred pages, and many of them express different interpretations. These notes are not intended to be a self-sufficient text in economics. They are intended as a basis for class analysis and discussion, particularly for labor groups. The statements themselves take on meaning only when they are explained, discussed, and perhaps modified by group analysis.

From the author's point of view, this is a brief outline of some basic principles of how our economy works. It is not expected that everyone will agree with all the statements. However, these notes may be useful as a basis for class discussion and as a reference for those who have taken a course in "How Our Economy Works."

It is well to remember that at best these notes can be but inadequate statements concerning a large and controversial subject.

INTRODUCTION

Terms Which Are Often Quoted

But Seldom Defined

Americanism

With the exception of the thinking of persons with Indian blood, all American ideas were originated by foreigners or descendants of foreigners.

When referring to economic institutions, the TVA is as American as U.S. Steel.

> The merit of an idea should be evaluated on the basis of its effectiveness in achieving a desired result--regardless of who thought of it first.

Free Enterprise

. . . does not mean something we inherited and therefore did not pay for.

. . . does not mean freedom to do completely as we please in the operation of a business. The government places many restrictions on business as well as other groups today.

Briefly, the term means the freedom to engage in a business and to compete with other businesses. Today there are so many restrictions that "Private Enterprise" seems to be a better term.

Depression
Recession
Readjustment

During the 1930's, everybody agreed that the economy was operating at such a low level that it was in a depression. The word recession has been used to indicate a more moderate decline in business activities. Readjustment has been used recently to indicate a temporary economic maladjustment, presumably to be followed by a "level" economy.

All three terms are used to designate varied degrees of economic maladjustment. There are no precise lines which indicate the differences in their meanings.

Some Basic Concepts

Economics

Economics is a study of the collective efforts of mankind to satisfy their material needs and wants.

It is concerned with --

- -- How and how much -- technique and volume of output of goods and services.
- -- What is to be produced.
- -- For whom -- distribution of income.

These three factors determine the economic welfare of the people.

Economic Behavior

Economics is concerned with psychology because human behavior is a basic factor in economics.

Each individual in the economy is motivated in large measure by self-interest. He is moved to promote the welfare and security of himself and his family.

A lot of individual behaviors make up the total economy.

The Total Economy

We can only get at economic processes by looking at the total economy. The parts of the economy are not independent but are interrelated. A depression in one industry may affect the entire economy.

The entire national economy tends to function as a single complex unit which is influenced by economies of other parts of the world as well.

The Individual and the Total Economy

The individual's immediate interest may not appear to be consistent with the general welfare. The individual, in doing what seems to be best for himself, may be doing others or even himself economic injury.

Prices can be raised by spending and lowered by saving; but we, individually, tend to spend when prices should be lowered and save when prices should be raised. When prices are increasing, people tend to buy before prices go higher. This will hasten the price increase.

The individual welfare is dependent on the general welfare more nearly than the other way around as some early economists assumed.

Scarcity

Nature does not provide goods in the forms desirable or useful for human consumption. Nature provides raw materials out of which human effort creates the things we want and need. What we may consume is limited by what we produce.

The problems of production and distribution arise from this scarcity and our efforts to overcome it.

Collective Effort

"Common" interest is the implicit purpose of an economic society. We can do together what is impossible to do individually.

Interdependence

No individual worker produces for his own use -- Except very incidentally. Most of the things consumed by each individual are produced by others. The farmer uses the products of steelworkers, machinists, and equipment workers. These in turn use the products of building tradesmen, factory workers, and farmers.

We depend on the demands of others in what we produce and on the products of others for what we consume.

The Use of Facts

Facts can describe a situation. The amount and Distrubution of the national income, and the volume of output, the volume of sales, the wage rates, and fluctuations in the cost of living are economic facts.

Facts will describe a situation, but not a function. Facts will tell us what, but not necessarily why or how.

The Economic Process

E

The economy as a whole is a process of cause and effect relationships. Human nature will respond to the environment, but man can influence and change his environment.

Men shape the economic institutions of which they amy be both the victims and the beneficiaries.

The Process of Production

Priduction and Exchange

People sell their services and the use of property for money income. With this money they buy the goods created by the combination of their labor and capital.

What and how much goods shall be produced are determined by the kind and quantity of goods people are willing and able to buy. They are limited by the availability of productive resources.

Productive Resources

Our capacity to produce is determined by --

- -- The volume and effectiveness of human effort (manpower and productivity).
- -- The availability of natural resources.
- -- The extent of mechanization and other forms of capital development.

All three factors are essential to modern industry.

Techniques of Production

Improved machinery and new production methods have increased productivity. Increases in productivity are best expressed in terms of output per man hour.

The average increase in output per man hour for the economy as a whole is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per year. (See Table 1.)

Private Enterprise

Ownership is based on three different types of business organization --

- -- The single enterprise -- owned by one person who assumes responsibility for the success or failure of the business.
- -- The partnership -- owned by two or more persons. Each partner has full liability for the debts of the business.
- -- The corporation -- owned by stockholders. It combines the savings of many people in one enterprise. The individual stockholders are not liable for the debts of the corporation.

The predominant method of ownership in the United States is private enterprise.

Public Enterprise

This includes industries owned by the federal, state, or municipal government, or a subdivision thereof. Some are run directly by an agency of the government. Others are administered apart from the government through autonomous public corporations. In addition to outright public ownership, there is public control over various phases of private enterprise.

Public ownership is most frequently found in public utility or public service enterprises.

However, even in this area, public enterprise accounts for only a part of the total industry.

INCOME

Sources of Income

Service

Service income includes wages, salaries, and commissions. Earnings in this category are based on effort and skill.

This includes income earned by skilled and unskilled labor, white-collar workers, professional men, and executives and managers.

Ownership

Ownership income includes relatively fixed income received from interest on bonds, mortgages, etc., and rent on real estate.

It also includes income from investment which will vary in amount, depending on business conditions.

These incomes are derived from ownership of property and investment of money.

Self-Employment

There is a large group of persons in the economy who receive income from both ownership and service. It is difficult to divide this income accurately between the two sources.

Included in this group are farmers who work their own farms and owner-operators of small business establishments.

The National Income

Total National Income

For the third quarter of 1964 the national income amounted to $514,500,000,000.
(See Table 8.)

This total includes all of the labor and property incomes earned in producing the national output of goods.

National Income by Distributive Shares (See Table 8)

The amount of the national income is stated in current dollars. When the price level goes up or down, it will be reflected in the amount which represents the national income. The distributive shares (i.e., the shares going to labor, property owners, etc.), of the national income would not be affected by fluctuations in the price level if income and prices moved at the same pace for all income groups.

During periods of rapidly rising prices, the percentage of the national income which is paid out in wages and salaries tends to decline while the percentage which goes into profits tends to increase.

Distribution by Income Level

In 1957 about 21 per cent of the spending units received annual incomes of less than $2,000 and only 5 per cent of the national money income. At the other end of the scale, 8 per cent of the spending units received annual incomes of $10,000 or more and 25 per cent of the national money income. (See Table 4.)

The relative distribution of income changed during the ten-year period beginning with 1947 and ending with 1957. In 1947, 14 per cent of the spending units had incomes of $5,000 and over while 50 per cent had incomes between $2,000 and $5,000 and 36 per cent had less than $2,000 in annual income. (See Chart 1.) In 1957, 43 per cent had incomes of $5,000 and over, 36 per cent had incomes between $2,000 and $5,000, and 21 per cent had incomes under $2,000. It should be noted that some of this change has been cancelled out by changes in the price level. The Consumer Price Index increased by 26 per cent during this period. (See Table 2.)

Income Units by Tenths (See Table 5.)

The relative economic position of the lowest tenth of the income units did not change during the ten-year period. In both 1947 and 1957 this group received only 1 per cent of the total income.

When we divide the income units in half, we find a moderate change. In 1947 the upper half received 79 per cent of the national income while in 1957 the upper half received 78 per cent and in 1962 this had declined to 77 per cent. The greatest change is in the income of the top tenth whose share dropped from 33 per cent to 29 per cent in 1957 and 28 per cent in 1962.

Workers' Income

Gross average weekly earnings of production workers in manufacturing industries in February, 1959, was $88.00, in current dollars. (See Table 3.) In terms of 1947-49 dollars, the take-home pay of a worker with three dependents was $64.02.

Annual income varies considerably from year to year for individuals and groups, depending on the volume and stability of employment.

The workers' real income must be computed on the basis of a stable dollar. If their money income merely keeps pace with prices, their real income remains unchanged.

City Workers' Family Budget

In Chicago the annual cost of a "modest but adequate" level of living for a four-person family in October, 1951, was $4,185. (See Table 6.)

This "budget" is based on the cost of a representative list of goods and services considered necessary by urban families to provide for health, efficiency, the nurture of children, and participation in social and community activities.

Occupational Differences in Income

Following is a sample list of average weekly earnings in a few industrial classifications for November, 1964:

|---|---|
| Average for all manufacturing | $104.70 |
| Laundries, cleaning and dyeing plants | 56.36 |
| General Building Contractors | 122.11 |
| Flat glass manufacturing | 151.98 |

(Source: Monthly Labor Review)

Factors which account for some of these differences in earnings are the supply of and demand for the different degrees of skill and the extent of unionization in the craft or industry.

Business Executives

The annual income of corporation executives may range from $25,000 to $200,000 with a few getting a great deal more than this top figure. The salary schedule tends to vary with the size of the corporation, although there is no rule-of-thumb guide to the size of executive salaries.

Some move stars receive salaries which compare favorably with those of executives of the largest corporations.

Inequalities in the Distribution of Income

Uneven distribution of income may be both a cause and effect of economic problems. Poor business can be the result of too many people having low incomes. A rapid rise in prices may leave low income groups with even lower real incomes.

Trade union action and governmental taxation and fiscal policies may affect the amount and distribution of spendable income.

The Meaning of Income to the Individual

A steady money income is essential so that a person can provide food, clothing, and shelter for himself and his family.

A person's expenditures for education, recreation, health, travel, and charity will vary with the amount of income.

PRICES

Price Determination

Supply and Demand

When the demand is high relative to the supply, the price will be "high." When the supply is large relative to the demand, the price will be "low."

> Effective demand must be represented by buying power--money or credit. Available buying power may fluctuate between different products. When a person spends more money on one product, he has less to spend on others.

Three Kinds of Demand

Demand for a commodity is elastic when a fall in prices would cause an increase in the amount of money spent for that commodity or when an increase in prices would cause a decrease in the amount of money spent.

Demand for a commodity is inelastic when a fall in prices would cause a decrease in the amount of money spent for that commodity or when an increase in prices would cause an increase in the amount of money spent.

Demand for a commodity is unity when a rise or fall in prices would not change the total amount spent.

> Total demand is determined by total money income. This amount is not necessarily altered by any individual price change. Total demand tends to be unity except in periods of substantial inflation or deflation.

Demand for Different Products

Demand for some food products is rather inelastic. This fact aggravates the farm problem. When crops are large, the price the farmer gets for his products decreases much faster than demand increases--leaving an unsold surplus. This is the reason for government support for farm prices. The demand for such items as television sets or automobiles may be elastic.

> If the price of wheat should drop 50 per cent, the quantity of wheat sold would not be doubled. However, if the price of television sets were cut 50 per cent, the number sold might more than double.

Prices and Production

A rise in the price of a commodity will tend to cause more of that commodity to be produced. As more is produced, the price will tend to decline.

Thus the price mechanism will operate to establish an equilibrium of supply and demand.

Competition and Monopoly

Competition

Perfect competition is usually defined as a condition which exists when many firms sell identical products.

Perfect competition will yield the largest quantity of goods at the lowest possible price.

Monopoly

Monopoly is usually defined as a condition which exists when one firm sells a completely unique product.

Under monopoly the supply and the price would be set at a point that would yield the highest return to the company. If the product is one with an elastic demand, the price would be lower and the quantity higher than in the case of a product with an inelastic demand.

Degrees of Competition and Monopoly

American business today is characterized by wide variations of competition and partial or substantial monopoly. The extent of competition, or monopoly power, varies from industry to industry and from product to product.

It may be harder to keep competition out if a monopoly becomes too profitable.

Substantial competition may make it difficult, or impossible, to reap high profits.

This may lead to formal and informal combinations to reduce competition and to improve the chances for profit.

The Price Level

The price level means an average of all prices. It concerns mainly the cost-of-living or what is more accurately called the Consumer Price Index. This price index is based on a budget of goods and services purchased by the families of urban wage earners and salaried clerical workers. (See Table 2.)

The cost-of-living is determined by consumer buying power (effective total consumer demand) in proportion to the volume of goods offered for sale (demand).

Consumer Buying Power

Most of the consumers get their buying power from wages, salaries, and self-employment. The persons whose main source of income is from stocks and bonds are a minority in modern society.

A decline in employment may be a major cause of a decline in consumer income. An increase in employment will have the opposite effect.

Consumer Behavior

A consumer may spend less than his income by saving, or he may, for a short period, spend more than his income by buying on credit. The consumer's behavior may be determined by whether or not he thinks prices will go up or down.

The trend of prices may determine the rate of spending while the rate of spending will determine the price trend. In the long run, however, the consumer cannot spend more than his income. His behavior is limited by his income.

Industrial Expansion

Industrial expansion (e.g., the building of new plants or improving of the old ones) creates employment and increases wage incomes.

This will tend to increase prices also.

Government Spending

When a government spends more than it receives in taxes, it is giving the consumers more purchasing power than it takes away.

This adds to total consumer buying power and will cause an increase in the level of consumer prices. It also causes an increase in the national debt.

Wages and Prices

General Wage Increases

Increasing money wages for workers as a group without increasing production will tend to increase prices in general.

The amount of the price increase will be determined by the ratio of the wage increase to total buying power.

A 10 per cent increase in money wages cannot be responsible for more than a 10 per cent increase in prices.

If wages constitute 60 per cent of the national income, a 10 per cent increase in wages will add only 6 per cent to the national income and should directly cause only a 6 per cent increase in the price level.

Wages in an Industry

Increasing money wages for workers in an entire industry without increasing productivity will increase the cost or production in that industry. Within an entire industry, companies can more easily add this cost increase to the price of their products because there is little competition on this score. The result will be an increase in the prices of the products of that industry.

An increase in real wages in one industry will thus be paid for by consumers.

Wages in a Single Plant

An increase in wages in one plant may increase real wages at the expense of profit. Competition with other plants may prevent a price increase.

MONEY

The Function of Money

The Meaning of Money

Money is a medium of exchange (purchasing power). People want money not for itself but for what it will buy.

It is a measure of value.

Money is a medium of distributing the products of industry.

Desirable Qualities

Money must be generally acceptable. The storekeeper must be willing to take your money without fear or doubt about its value.

Money must be relatively limited in quantity. Too much money means extreme inflation which destroys the value of money.

Money must be divisible into small change or any specified amount in order to accommodate all kinds of purchases.

The Value of Money

The value of money is another way of referring to the price level, except that the movement of the value of money is the reverse of price fluctuations. That is, when prices go up, the value of money is going down.

The value of money is determined by the quantity of money relative to the quantity of goods.

Precious Metals

Gold and silver have been used as money in various parts of the world. Not too long ago it was thought necessary to have "gold backing" for paper money. Now we think that factors in the economy, plus banking and fiscal policies, will control the quantity of money; and this is what gives money its value.

The fact that gold has some monetary uses tends to increase the value of gold rather than the other way around.

Kinds of Money

General Classification

Generally speaking, we have three kinds of money today: metal currency, paper money, and bank deposits.

The first two represent the cash we use for daily small transactions, such as buying groceries, while the bulk of the nation's money is bank deposits.

Metal Currency

Metal currency includes copper pennies, nickel five-cent pieces, and the various denominations of silver coins.

All these together constitute only about 4 per cent of the community's cash.

Paper Money

The dollar bills are Silver Certificates. Most other denominations of paper bills are Federal Reserve Notes. The dollar bill is redeemable for a silver dollar, but Federal Reserve Notes are redeemable for lawful money. This means that you can go to the bank and exchange your $10 bill for another $10 bill any time you wish to do so.

The bulk of our currency is "folding money."

Bank Deposits

Bank deposits are made up of demand deposits which are subject to withdrawal by checking. Payment by check is more convenient for paying large amounts, for making payment by mail, for providing a receipt in the form of a cancelled check, and for protection against loss.

The amount of all our bank deposits is usually four times as large as the total of our paper and metal currency.

Bank Credit

Functions of Banks

The primary functions of commercial banks are to receive deposits, honor checks drawn upon them, and lend money to individuals and businesses.

There are between 14,000 and 15,000 commercial banks in the United States.

Creating Deposits

The banking system can create money by lending because the borrower usually does not want his money in cash. The process is something like this:

1. The borrower makis a bank deposit and receives a check book.

2. He spends the money by drawing checks which are either deposited in a bank or cashed.

3. In the case of checks which are deposited, no cash has left the banking system. In the case of checks which are cashed, the cash is spent with merchants who redeposit the money in the bank.

In either case only small amounts of cash have left the bank temporarily. All that has happened is that deposits have been created and subsequently the ownership of these deposits has been shifted on the books of the bank from one depositor to others.

Cash Reserves

A bank needs only enough cash to carry on day-to-day business. Cash held by the bank is known as the cash reserve. The reserve requirements are set within legal limits by the Federal Reserve Board.

If the reserve requirement against demand deposits is 20 per cent, it is legally possible for the banking system to have deposits in an amount five times as large as the cash reserves. A 20 per cent reserve is much larger than is normally necessary.

The Federal Reserve Bank

Federal Reserve Banks are bankers' banks. Their primary function is to lend money to commercial banks. When a bank which is a member of the Federal Reserve System needs cash, it can borrow on approved securities from the Federal Reserve Bank.

It is possible, through the banking system, not only to expand the supply of money by expanding credit deposits but also to expand the cash (currency) reserve which can be the basis for further credit expansion.

PROFITS, WAGES, AND SAVINGS

The Profit Motive

Profit as Motive

Private enterprise produces goods to sell at a profit. The owners of industrial enterprises may be motivated by a number of other factors, but without profit private business cannot thrive.

> No business can sell goods at a loss and stay in business. In the case of a monoply, profit may be a motive to cut production.

An Incentive to Invest

Profit is an incentive to invest in productive enterprise. Investment tends to vary with the prospect of profit. When the prospect for profit is good, the volume of investment capital can be expanded through bank credit.

> There need never be a shortage of investment funds, although investors' anticipations of future prospects may restrict these funds.

Profit and Industrial Expansion

Industry and business will tend to expand when profits are high or are rising. Industry tends to stop expanding when profits are low or are declining.

> The trend of profits may be more important that the rate of profits in stimulation industrial growth.

Source of Profits

Money profits must be taken from Consumer money income in the selling price (the price the consumer pays for the product). Most such income is received as payment for service in production of the goods offered for sale. This income tends to be only large enough to buy the product at the cost of production. The added consumer buying power must come from --

1. Consumer credit.

2. Employment in the production of exports in excess of imports.

3. Employment in the construction or improvement of industrial plants and equipment which are financed by investment of savings or bank credit.

4. Employment resulting from government deficit spending (when the government spends more than it receives).

That portion of consumer income which can yield a profit to industry must come from employment which does not add to current output of consumer goods, or it must come as a result of many consumers living beyond their current income. (For figures on productivity and wages, see Tables 1 and 3.)

Savings and Investment

Reinvested Profit

Reinvested profit will help to maintain consumer money income. Investment money goes into the construction of plants and equipment and comes to the consumers as wages, salaries, and other incomes.

Reinvested profit may become a revolving fund which forces a rapid expansion of industry and a rapid growth of ownership and power for the recipients of large profits.

Consumer Buying Power

Profits will be high when consumer buying power is high relative to total output, or profits will rise when consumer buying power is rising relative to output. Consumer buying power is determined by consumer income. Most people receive their income from --

1. Wages from business and industry.

2. Operating a farm.

3. Operating a small business.

To sell the total output at a stable rate of profit, it is necessary for consumer income to increase at the same rate as productivity.

Savings

Money income which is saved does not remove goods from the market. When profit, wages, or any other form of income is saved, the amount must be made up by additional income elsewhere.

Others may borrow and spend what some people save.

Savings and Investment

Savings, regardless of whether they originate with profits, salaries, or wages, must be matched by either investment in industrial expansion, exports in excess of imports, government deficit spending, or consumer credit.

Those with high incomes own most of the savings. (See Table 10.)

Wage Income

Wages as Consumer Income

Wages and salaries make up more than 60 per cent of the annual national income. (See Table 8.) This includes many low incomes. Persons with low incomes must spend their entire incomes on the necessities of life. Persons with high incomes can elect to spend, save, or invest any amount beyond what is necessary for a comfortable livelihood.

Consumer spending can be increased effectively by increasing incomes at the low income level.

Total Wage Incomes

"Total wages" is the sum total of all wages received by all wage earners. During a depression real wage rates may increase as a result of declining prices, but total buying power of wage earners will shrink because of declining employment.

To compute the trend of total real wage income, it is necessary to consider average weekly earnings, the total number of employed wage earners, and the trend of the cost of living.

Increasing Wage Income

Total purchasing power of earners can increase by --

1. Wage increases not offset by price increases.
2. Expansion of employment. This can be done by private or public investment.
3. Consumer credit.

The government can indirectly increase workers' spendable income by reducing taxes.

Consumer Credit

Expansion of consumer credit can be a temporary means of expanding consumer spending power. To be effective, consumer credit must continue to expand. When it stops expanding it means that new loans are being made at the same rate as payments on old loans. This reduces spending to current consumer income. When consumer credit declines, total consumer spending will decline. When a worker with an annual income of $4,000 buys $2,000 worth of goods on credit, he must pay for it out of his next year's income. This means in effect that he has reduced his next year's income by half.

Spending next year's income this year increases this year's spending but reduces next year's. The illusion of prosperity will be temporary.

(For volume of consumers' credit see Table 7)

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

The Mechanics of Trade Between Nations

Trading Goods for Goods

In the international market, goods are exchanged for goods. Exports can be paid for ultimately only by imports.

Gold shipments take place when imports and exports are out of balance.

Making International Payments

When we export goods to England, we receive payment in dollars, but England can acquire dollars only by selling goods to us. The local merchant who imports goods from England uses dollars to buy pounds to make payment. British pounds can be acquired only by exporting goods to Britain. Foreign countries can get U. S. dollars only by selling us goods or services.

Each nation's money is good only for buying goods within its own borders. When trade between nations takes place, an exchange rate will determine the relative value of the different moneys.

Item of Trade

Among the items which are included in the international balance of trade, in addition to merchandise, are tourist expenditures and shipping services which are usually referred to as "invisible" items.

The expenditures of American tourists abroad have the same effect as imports into the United States.

Capital Movements

When Americans make investments abroad, it means the export of capital goods (productive facilities).

The collection of dividends from these investments means either a reinvestment in the same country or an export from that country to ours.

Implications of Export Capital

Investment abroad means (1) a market in the form of export, (2) an import of dividends, and (3) a competitor for domestic and foreign markets.

Foreign investments will expand domestic employment by production for export without the immediate necessity of a balancing import.

World Industrial Development

U. S. investments in underdeveloped foreign countries will hasten the development of modern industries throughout the world. This will raise the world standard of living.

U. S. investments abroad may, however, run into political complications which contain serious international implications.

Advantages of International Trade

World Specialization

Wheat can be grown on the central plans of the United States, where it will grow best, and can then be exchanged for coffee, tropical fruits, or some manufactured goods which can be produced best in some other part of the world.

The world-wide trading of goods produced most economically in areas of geographic specialization will result in the highest world output of goods.

Resources for Modern Industry

Modern industry must get raw materials from a world market. For example, (1) metals used in the manufacture of high grade steel come from many parts of the world, and (2) rubber comes from areas which were largely inaccessible to us during World War II so that we had to go to the expense of building synthetic rubber plants.

Modern industry needs world trade because of the world distribution of raw materials.

A High Level of Living

By encouraging production where goods can be turned out most efficiently, free world trade will increase the total world production. This increased production will raise the level of living throughout the world.

People everywhere will have a greater variety of goods in larger quantities.

Trade and Employment

The Export Market

Exports are matched by imports when trade is balanced. Employment will increase to the extent that international trade stimulates increases in total production. Exports in excess of imports can add proportionately to employment. This condition can prevail if we export capital as investments or if the government gives the goods away on a deficit budget. When a government foreign aid program is financed on a balanced budget, it merely means that taxpayers are paying for the exports out of current income. This does not necessarily add to domestic employment.

Temporarily we can export without imports by selling goods abroad on credit.

Competition with Cheap Labor

Exports must be paid for eventually by imports. Therefore, there is always a tendency toward balance. As long as imports and exports are in balance, there is no loss of employment on either side. When we export expensive goods in exchange for cheaper imported products, we are merely making available to domestic consumers a large number of cheap products instead of a small number of expensive products.

In such cases, the consumer gets more and cheaper products while the rate of employment remains unchanged.

This may, of course, require some shifting of investment and employment from less efficient to more efficient industries.

Tariffs

High tariffs will stop exports by stopping imports. This means that workers are employed in "protected" domestic trade industries rather than in export industries.

Consumers will have fewer and more expensive products. This may lead to a reduction in total employment and a decline in consumer buying power.

PROSPERITY AND DEPRESSION

Price Movements

Business Cycles

When demand for goods is low, business is bad; and when the demands for goods is high, business is good. Fluctuations in demand for goods depend upon fluctuations in consumer buying power (consumer income). These up-and-down ovements of business conditions are referred to by economists as the business cycle.

Business conditions are rarely stable. There are almost constant fluctuations in the volume of business, prices, production, and employment.

Inflation

Inflation is defined as an increase in money income without a corresponding increase in the production of goods offered for sale.

An inflationary trend usually accompanies an upward swing of the business cycle or prosperity.

Who gains by Inflation?

Individuals who reap the greatest gain during a period of inflation are (1) those who speculate in property values, (2) merchants, and (3) debtors.

Persons who put their money into property, even in they must borrow the money are the chief gainers. It is the time for investment and industrial expansion.

Who Loses by Inflation?

Those who lose during inflation are (1) persons with savings, (2) persons with fixed rates of income or those whose income fails to keep pace with rising prices, and (3) creditors.

Persons who own money or who lend money lose. Banks, however, need not lose to the same extent because they lend other people's money.

General Results

The general results of an inflation usually are (1) decline in real wage rates, (2) an increase in employment, (3) an increase in profits, (4) high production, and (5) a high rate of industrial expansion.

These may not be the ultimate results if the inflation becomes excessive or gets out of control.

Deflation

Deflation is defined as a decline in money income without a corresponding decline in output of goods.

Deflation usually means a surplus of goods on the market, unemployment, and depression.

Effect on Individuals

What happens to individuals during a period of deflation is the opposite of what happens during inflation.

Investment is hazardous and saving is profitable. Saved money will increase in value as prices go down.

Results of Deflation

The general results of deflation usually are (1) real wage rates increase, (2) unemployment increases, (3) profits decline, (4) production declines, and (5) industrial expansion slows down.

Severe deflation will result in business failures and depression.

Employment

The Labor Force

The labor force increases as the population increases. In order to have full employment, it is necessary that employment increase at the same rate as the labor force.

If employment merely stops increasing, unemployment will increase.

Unemployment is Cumulative

When total consumer income fails to keep pace with the total output of consumer goods, employment will decline. A decline in employment will cause a further decline in consumer income which will again further reduce employment. This is the process of cumulative unemployment.

To stop this process it is necessary to take measures to counteract growing unemployment.

Reduced Earnings

It is possible for payrolls to decline without an increase in unemployment.

Weekly paychecks can be reduced by a reduction in the work week.

Economic Behavior

From an over-all economic standpoint, people tend to behave wrongly during both deflation and inflation. During deflation and depression when the need is to increase employment, private investors are conspicuously absent. People who save instead of investigating make the depression worse. On the other hand, during an upswing in prices and business activity, increasing prospects of profit will stimulate the expansion of bank bredit into investment channels and thereby increase the inflationary trend.

For this reason, some form of government action usually is called for to check both inflation and deflation.

Slowing Down the Depression

Some factors which may slow down the development of a depression are --

1. Unemployment insurance which provides the unemployed worker with some income for a period after he becomes unemployed.

2. Insurance of bank deposits which protect the small saver from losing his savings when he needs them most.

3. Pensions which provide some income for retired workers.

The value of some of these factors will be reduced when an inflation preceded the recession.

Government Action

The government can increase consumer income by a number of methods. Among them are --

1. Cutting taxes and thereby increasing spendable income.

2. Increasing employment through public works.

3. Giving outright gifts to consumers through relief programs.

4. Establishing supports for farm income.

5. Stimulating investment through lowering the interest rate.

6. Increasing consumer potential spending by decreasing restraints on consumer credit.

Government action to increase consumer income cannot be financed by a tax on consumer income. The customary method of financing such measures is by a government deficit.

7. Maximum welfare with maximum individual freedom.

(a) Freedom means democratic procedure.

(b) Means restraints on owners and managers of industry.

(c) Industrial democracy.

(d) Long-range planning in solving immediate problems.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

ATLANTA---The Southern Regional Education Board has announced its sponsorship of a regional program, now in its fourth year, of college student internships in resource development.

Dr. Winfred L. Godwin, SREB director, said 100 interns will work on projects for local organizations in 12 Southern states this summer, under grants from four federal agencies.

The interns will perform research, planning and services as directed by the local organizations, and with the guidance of faculty members at nearby universities and colleges.

Projects will cover the spectrum of social sciences relating to the development of human resources, from legal services and employment problems to community action programs, city planning, industrial and economic development.

Now being selected, the interns will be juniors, seniors and graduate students. Undergraduate interns will receive stipends of $65 a week for the 12-week period, and graduate interns $75 a week. Some will receive college credit for their work.

Federal agencies supporting the summer internships are the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Economic Development Administration, the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Department of Labor.

Originated in 1964 with support from TVA, the internship program was coordinated in 1966 by the Oak Ridge Associated Universities in Oak Ridge, Tennessee.

William Ramsay has been named director of SREB's Resource Development Project and will supervise the program. He served with the Oak Ridge Associated Universities for 12 years.

He is an alumnus of Berea College, where he majored in history and political science, and he was a graduate fellow at the Universities of Alabama, Tennessee and Kentucky under the Southern Regional Training Program in Public Administration.

SREB was established in 1949 under interstate compact, now ratified by the legislatures of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia.

SREB aids in the social and economic advancement of the South by assisting states to improve the quality of higher education . . . provide the widest opportunity possible in higher education . . . provide regional support and utilization of advanced programs.

Assisting him as internship coordinator at SREB will be Robert L. Sigmon, who holds an A. B. in liberal arts from Duke University and a B. D. from Union Theological Seminary in New York.

He also studied at the United Theological College in Bangalore, India, and served as a Methodist missionary in Raiwind, West Pakistan, for three years.

Michael Hart will serve as field representative in the internship program. He is an alumnus of St. Ambrose College and has done graduate work in political science at the University of Tennessee.

He previously was a program analyst for the Tennessee Office of Economic Opportunity, and before that, an administrative analyst on the staff of the Tennessee comptroller.

Dear Ed,

I received a letter from Jack Minnis telling me that he had done some research for South Carolina in 1962 to 1963 which has some relation to the work that I am doing. It involves statistics on land distribution, crop land harvested, etc. Do you still have this information and would it be available to me?

I will probably see you in a week or two.

Sincerely

FOREWORD

After Mississippi, Alabama is the poorest state in the nation. Yet very few people talk about Alabama or know much about it. It has captured neither the imagination nor the shame of the nation as Mississippi has; teams of doctors and civil rights workers have not poured into the state to help its black citizens. Yet black Alabamians have shared the same hardships as their brothers in Mississippi; they have lost as many or more men to the racial struggle.

While Mississippi has three full-time civil rights law offices with a dozen full-time lawyers to help needy persons, Alabama has not even one full-time civil rights law office. It has a dozen private lawyers who handle civil rights cases on a part-time basis and only one full time civil rights lawyer, the Director of the Southern Rural Research Project (SRRP). The Governor of Alabama even rejected and OEO legal services program (which Mississippi has) which would have provided some relief for the poor and cost the state nothing.

While all of Mississippi's 82 counties have pre-school Headstart Centers, only 20 of Alabama's 67 counties (30%) have Headstart Centers.

In the blackbelt counties of Alabama where Negroes make up as much as 80% of the population, black farmers had to set up their own organization (SWAFCA) in order to get the same benefits from the Federal farm programs that the white farmers receive.

"Civil rights," as it is popularly known, is secondary in importance to people who are starving; their main concern is survival. SRRP is not fighting for the right to vote, the right to go to the "white" school, restaurant or motel, nor for the right of the civil rights worker to demonstrate, etc. SRRP IS FIGHTING ONLY FOR PEOPLE TO HAVE A LITTLE FOOD, MEDICAL HELP AND OTHER BASIC ESSENTIALS OF LIFE.

The following report will give some idea of the projects engaged in by the SRRP staff during its first year; it will also outline its plans for the future. If they seem all-encompassing, it is because so much needs to be done and so little has been done in Alabama. We hope that we will be able to expand both our legal and field staff to ensure the success of our efforts.

Donald A. Jelinek

SOUTHERN RURAL RESEARCH PROJECT

Purpose

The SOUTHERN RURAL RESEARCH PROJECT (SRRP) is a civil rights research and law organization which has been operating in Selma, Alabama since May of 1967 for the purpose of combating day-to-day racial discrimination by southern-born, southern-bred, and federally salaried employees. Its aim is to have a significant effect upon Federal and state regulatory agencies which dispense millions of Federal monies in the South and do more than their share to perpetuate the poverty that keeps the Negro in bondage.

The Federal government has poured billions of dollars into its "War on Poverty" but is financing massive and organized subversion of that "War" by its own agencies in the South. SRRP was created to collect data documenting such misuse of Federal funds and to deal with the information by litigation and other means.

Origins

SRRP was formed to fill the vacuum created by the removal of the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee (LCDC) from Alabama in 1966. In that year, LCDC brought suit in Washington, D.C. against the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) charging discrimination by one of its agencies in Alabama.

While achieving a limited victory, LCDC earned the ire of the plantation owners, their attorneys and the state of Alabama, which led to its eventual ouster. Not only was its staff counsel arrested and prohibited from practicing in the state courts of Alabama, but one witness who testified at the hearing in Washington was shot at and others were evicted from their long-time homes on plantations. The need for some group to challenge economic discrimination in the state of Alabama was immediately apparent.

Staff

The present director of SRRP is Donald A Jelinek, who was the arrested LCDC lawyer. Mr. Jelinek (white) is a 34-year-old former New York attorney who has lived and worked in the South since August of 1965. He is also legal counsel for the Southwest Alabama Farmers Co-operative Association (SWAFCA).

Kathleen A. Veit (white), Associate Director of SRRP, is a 24-year-old graduate of Western Washington State College. She has been in the South since December of 1966, originally employed by LCDC in Selma to investigate jury discrimination.

Dondra Simmons (black), 19, is a community worker who has been with the project since the summer of 1967 when she left Queens College in New York to work full time with SRRP.

U. Z. Nunnally (black) is a 22-year-old Mississippian who was with the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) in 1964 and then the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in Alabama before joining SRRP.

Nancy Scheper (white), 24 years old, was a Peace Corps worker in Brazil, is now a full-time field worker for SRRP.

Robert Rembert (black), 20, has been active in civil rights in his native Marengo County, Alabama, since 1965, marched with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) at the confrontation across the bridge in Selma, and is now full-time with SRRP.

Rio Lanette Brooks (black) is SRRP's secretary. She is a 17-year-old high school student, a native of Selma, Alabama.

Attorney Howard Thorkelson of the Center for Social Welfare, Policy and Law at Columbia University has been an active consultant for SRRP in the application of Federal programs.

Backing

SRRP has the support of major civil rights organizations including the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Urban League. It also has the backing of such support agencies as the Southern Rural Action Project (Citizens Crusade Against Poverty), the American Friends Service Committee, the Southern Regional Council, the Alabama Council on Human Relations, the Georgia Council on Human Relations and the National Sharecroppers Fund.

SRRP SINCE MAY, 1967

1967 Summer Program

As its first project, SRRP invited students from all over the United States to participate in a massive job of information-gathering in rural black areas of Alabama and Mississippi. Students, along with local persons, using a two-part, 23-page in-depth questionnaire dealing with agriculture programs and household conditions, interviewed over 1000 heads of households (representing over 5,000 persons).

The workers in each state received no more than $5 per week for expenses while living and eating as guests of local black families. Students were evicted from plantations at pistol-point, threatened on numerous occasions, and had questionnaires confiscated by the local police. One student was arrested for trespassing, and another had his room shot into. Fortunately no injuries occurred.

Certain general conclusions were evident from the information gathered in Alabama and Mississippi.

1. The vast majority of black farmers fear the employees of Federal farm programs,* a situation which results in a low level of eligible black participants in programs. The black farmer, conditioned by years of experience, views the farm program employee as the southerner who calls him "nigger," "boy," and "grandpa." The black farmer knows that if he goes to one of the agency offices, he will have to wait on a long line and watch while the white man is attended to as soon as he enters. He also knows that if he angers the local agent with his persistence, his credit with local merchants may be canceled.

2. The ASCS cotton allotments and subsidy checks for blacks are lower than those for whites. FHA loans for the purchase of land, equipment and the improvement of farm buildings are virtually unavailable for blacks, and the rejections are rarely recorded. The county agent of the Extension Service, whose job its is to pass on information acquired at the federally supported Land Grant Colleges, rarely does so for black farmers.

3. Black farm families are hungry. The vast majority of black farmers, whose limited income is used up before

---

*The farm programs involved here are: Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS), Farmers Home Administration (FHA) and the Federal Extension Service (FES).

1967 was the worst cotton year since 1895 because of droughts and freezing weather. The poverty of black farmers in 1968 has never been worse.

winter, are typically forced to eat the following:

| Morning | Noon Meal | Evening Meal |
|---|---|---|
| GritsBiscuitsCoffee | VegetablesCornbreadKool-Aid(Usually no noon meal after the harvest season) | Vegetables(sometimes with pork parts mixed in)CornbreadKool-Aid |

Free Surplus Commodities, when available, provide a limited supplement to the few vegetables grown in the family garden, but when free food in a county is replaced by food stamps, many of the poorest families cannot afford to buy the food stamps and are left with no government help for food. Even those who have borrowing power fall into further debt in order to purchase the benefits of the food stamp program (See Food Suit, p. 8).

4. A typical home is an unpainted three-room wood frame shack housing 3-5 adults and 8-12 children—all of whom sleep in three or four double beds. The floors and ceilings remain in disrepair along with loosely fitting wood shutters for the windows, all of which accounts for continual dampness during the rainy season and severe cold during the winter. Cooking and very limited heat are provided by a small wood-burning, pot belly stove.

The experience of the staff indicates that poverty in the black South is directly related to active discrimination by southern Federal employees of the USDA and passive acquiescence of the national USDA. They also witnessed the fact that in Mississippi and Alabama, and probably elsewhere, a prosperous nation is not feeding starving and near-starving citizens.

The results of the two-part questionnaire were analyzed and processed by the Division of Behaviorial Science Research, Carver Research Foundation at Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Alabama. The statistical data of the Agriculture section will be ready shortly. The Household section was released in March, 1968; some of the results follow:

1. Nearly 25% of the black farm families interviewed eat no fresh meat of any kind at all. Another 25% eat meat only once a week.

2. Fresh milk is not used at all by 30.0% of the households.

3. Fresh fruit never appears in the diet of nearly half of the Negro farm families interviewed.

4. 18.5% never eat eggs at all.
5. Over one third of the children suffer from sores and scabs.

6. In 14.2% of the farm households visited, SRRP interviewers noted one or more children with very noticeably distended stomachs.

7. 12.7% of the women questioned who had had a pregnancy over the past 5 years had received no prenatal care. A third of the women had suffered at least one miscarriage. Two thirds of the rural Negro babies were born at home with the aid of a midwife.

8. One third of the mothers interviewed had lost one or more children; 68.0% of these children during their first year.

9. During the first year of life 20.4% of rural Negro babies received no medical attention whatsoever.

SRRP has prepared an analysis of the statistical results of the Household section: "BLACK FARM FAMILIES: Hunger and Malnutrition in Rural Alabama," released March, 1968.

Cotton Election Suit

SRRP's Director-Attorney is representing a group of black farmers in Macon County, Alabama who lost representation in the 1967 ASCS election* by 39 votes out of approximately 5,000 as a result of fraud by the white ASCS committee in power. By "packing" the ballot with "picked" blacks to confuse and split the black vote, by adding white voters beyond the deadline date, and by invalidating the ballots of legitimate black voters, the Macon County ASCS denied black farmers their rightful representation in making decisions vital to their own economic life.

Other Agricultural Litigation

As a corollary to the cotton election suit, SRRP is supporting farmers in obtaining Farmers Home Administration (FHA) loans

*The Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) operates the cotton program which determines the amount of cotton each farmer may plant (allotment), the amount of subsidy money each farmer receives (projected yield) and other decisions vital to the black farmer. ASCS elections are held once a year to elect the men who make these decisions. Even in counties with over 80 per cent eligible black majorities, no Negro has ever been elected. Discrimination has cost blacks the elections and has dramatically contributed to their poverty.

and in getting information and help from the Extension Service (FES).

In the near future, SRRP will represent farmers complaining about the abuses uncovered during the 1967 summer program, including the amount of the allotments and subsidy checks, the lack of FHA loans and a myriad of other USDA acts of economic discrimination.

The Food Suit

Peoples v. USDA, Civil Action No. 544-68, U.S. District Court, Washington, D.C.

On March 23, 1968, SRRP staff accompanied 130 black Alabamians to Washington to offer evidence of starvation caused in large part by the misapplication of Federal food programs. The group ranged in age from 7 weeks to 75 years; one witness brought her 14 children.

Even before the people arrived, the USDA reacted to the first part of the suit and "forced" a food program into Elmore County, Alabama against the wishes of the local county government. This act, which occurred 12 days after the suit was filed, accomplished what the USDA had previously said it could not or would not do.

The law suit charged:

1. USDA permits the state of Alabama to offer food programs in some counties and not in others (besides Elmore, there are three other counties in Alabama without food programs).
2. USDA permits excessive charges for food stamps which (1) forces many recipients to borrow in order to pay for them, and (2) eliminates over 50% of the poor who cannot afford any stamps at all.
3. USDA, in its Surplus Commodities (Free Food) program, does not provide food which meets its own minimal nutritional standards for survival—to the detriment of those who depend entirely on the commodities for food.

The hearing was held on March 25, 1968, before Federal Judge George L. Hart, Jr. Among the potential witnesses, besides the 130 Alabamians, were three doctors who had previously testified about conditions in Mississippi before a U.S. Senate Committee: Dr. Joseph

Brenner, Dr. Alan Mermann, and Dr. Raymond Wheeler. All were prepared to testify to the hunger and malnutrition in Alabama and to the inadequacy of the food programs to meet human needs. (The suit charged the Secretary of Agriculture has the power to eliminate these conditions but will not exercise it.)

Judge Hart rejected any live testimony but accepted the basic points of the lawsuit, that Alabama blacks were suffering hunger and starvation by malnutrition and that as a result they suffered severe mental and physical diseases. The hearing thus concerned itself with the legal argument as to whether the Court could interfere with the actions of a Cabinet member. While it evinced sympathy for the plaintiffs and outright criticism for the food programs and its operation, the Court declined to interefere with the Secretary.

Counsel for the plaintiffs (Donald A. Jelinek, Howard Thorkelson of the Center on Social Welfare, Policy and Law of Columbia University, and Edgar S. Cahn of the Citizens Advocate Center, Washington, D.C.) filed an immediate emergency appeal in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia which was heard a few days later. The three-judge panel denied both sides' motions but recommended a full-scale trial back in the district court to present more evidence; that trial will come up in the near future.

The New York Times (March 26, 1968) in an editorial on starvation in the U.S., and particularly Mississippi, referred to the suit as follows:

> As a court suit concerning the administration of the food-stamp plan in Alabama has made plain, too many county and state officials outside Mississippi as well as in it are shockingly indifferent to the hunger and privation of their own neighbors. It may be as Secretary of Agriculture Freeman contends—and as a Federal judge ruled yesterday—that the laws governing the food-stamp plan and the distribution of surplus commodities provide Federal officials with no leeway to intervene on behalf of hungry people if local officials refuse to cooperate. If that contention is upheld by a higher Federal court, Congress should move promptly to establish uniform Federal standards for programs and make certain that they are available to all who need them everywhere in the nation.

Other Food Litigation

On the local level, SRRP has been successful in reducing the price of food stamps for individuals by accompanying the complainants to the local food stamp office in Selma, Alabama. This effort will be expanded throughout the state (See p. 15).

Publications

1. As a corollary to the 1967 summer's work, SRRP prepared two booklets, "Food and Health Programs" and "Farm Programs: FHA, FES, ASCS." These booklets were handed out to those answering the questionnaires in an attempt to fill in some of the gaps of knowledge about programs and services that are available to the poor.

2. SRRP's analysis of the statistical results of the Household section of the questionnaire: "BLACK FARM FAMILIES: Hunger and Malnutrition in Rural Alabama," March, 1968.

FUTURE PLANS OF SRRP

Alabama 10-County Self-Help Legal Program

For those who work a full year on a farm without profit (or who have been automated off the farm), the Federal and state economic programs (for food, medicine, welfare, and agriculture subsidies and loans) are the major factor between survival and forced migration to northern ghettoes. Unfortunately, these programs in which white southern employees dispense Federal monies are the major sources of discrimination against needy black Alabamians.

The legal help needed to fight this situation is absent in Alabama (See Foreword). The few sympathetic black and white attorneys who have given years of service to provide aid on a part-time basis are hampered by their need to earn a living and, therefore, cannot handle many day-to-day problems. Yet the crying need for full-time legal assistance continues.

To attempt to meet this need, SRRP proposes to coordinate a self-help legal program for the 10 counties which make up the Southwest Alabama Farmers Co-operative Association (SWAFCA): Choctaw, Dallas, Greene, Hale, Lowndes, Marengo, Monroe, Perry, Sumter, and Wilcox.

One or two former full-time farmers in each county will be paid salary plus gas allowance to drive around the county to visit every farm family, ask questions from a prepared survey sheet which will demonstrate eligibility (and previous failures) for various programs, and then arrange for group visits to the "agency" office in town to apply. (The aide will, of course, be trained by the SRRP staff in the mechanics of the programs.) If there is a "rejection," the aide will handle the first "administrative" appeal (e.g., fair hearing in Welfare) as a representative of the applicant (no lawyer is needed). After this stage, SRRP's attorney will continued the appeal into the Federal Courts.

Dallas County Survey

SRRP has revised its 1967 questionnaire with the help of Tuskegee Institute and plans to interview every black farm family in Dallas County, Alabama (which includes the city of Selma). This survey will include: a detailed breakdown of the exact food eaten in every household, including the size of portions; a determination of the true financial picture of each family by analysis of income and expenses; and a record of those relatives of Dallas County residents who have migrated North, the reason for their migration, their present situation in the North, and the circumstances under which they would consider returning to their southern homes.*

*Of course, questions dealing with the Federal agriculture and food programs will be continued in an improved form.

The survey will also indicate areas lacking in telephones, paved roads, sewage, water lines, and transportation to town where the government offices are. By means of a small-scale, 3-dimensional model of the county, the great contrast between services offered the black and white communities will be visible. Dallas County has been chosen to represent in depth the problems that exist in other rural counties of the state and throughout the South.

1968 Summer Program

Utilizing the information gathered in the 1967 Summer Program, SRRP is now ready to take action in the area of health, as well as food and agriculture. With USDA programs denying the black farmer a chance to earn a decent living and with food programs not reaching many of the impoverished, it is only natural that poor people are suffering physically and not receiving medical attention.

This summer, SRRP plans a direct action program to fight to obtain money for poor families to see a doctor and to buy medicine (in addition to obtaining monies under the agriculture programs).

The summer's project will enlist the help of doctors, lawyers, medical students, law students, college students, and young people in general.

1. The Medical Aspect

There already exists in the South funds for doctors and medicine through state welfare offices which dispense Federal monies. Black families are unable to obtain these funds because white doctors (there are few black doctors in the South) refuse to certify their eligibility:

(a) because of the doctors' ties with the local county welfare officials; and/or

(b) because the doctors persist in believing that black people are inherently more capable of continuing to work with the same ailments that would incapacitate whites.

Medical experts will be brought down to provide the necessary information both to challenge the fairness and adequacy of the state health programs and to apply for OEO funds under a new law for rural medical aid.

2. The Legal Aspect

Lawyers and law students will analyze the applicable agricultural and welfare programs and apply the facts of each individual case to the laws and regulations as written. Then, they will make direct confrontations with county offices, appeal to the state and Washington offices and eventually move into the Federal courts. They will make appearances at hearings before the agencies to represent claimants, to present evidence and to argue issues of law. They will prepare applications for OEO funds to establish free medical centers and other medical service programs.

Lawyers and law students will also prepare "class" suits to seek injunctions and other broad relief aimed at the grievances uncovered and documented by the summer work.

Finally, they will assume the important function of explaining the various programs to the people and conducting meetings and workshops to train local persons to handle these problems within their own communities after the summer.

3. How the Summer Program Will Operate

With the approval and participation of the local community, field workers will gather information on eligibility, doctors will make examinations and evaluate eligibility, applications will be made for benefits and lawyers will handle rejection hearings, appeals and other litigation. The cooperation of sympathetic local physicians and hospitals will be solicited, and work with poor whites will be attempted. Most workers will live and eat with local black farmers.

In the course of their work, these volunteers will contribute information pertinent to that collected during the 1967 Summer Program, and legal action will be continued to work toward getting: money for poor families for food, doctors, and medicine; proper crop allotment and subsidy payments; loans for land, equipment and livestock; and expert agricultural advice.

Litigation

SRRP will continue and expand on its efforts to obtain honest application of governmental programs, beginning with litigation challenging the discriminatory operation of the National School Lunch Program in Alabama.

Publications

In the future SRRP will be publishing the following:

1. A newsletter written for local people in Alabama. It will explain governmental programs and keep people up-to-date on changes and additions in regulations and services. It will also provide news of specific interest to local communities.

2. A book for the lay-public describing the importance, legislative intent and actual operation of the Federal farm programs and their relation to black poverty in the South (and the resulting migration to the northern ghettoes).

3. An analysis on the results of the 1967 Agriculture questionnaire.

Other Projects

1. SRRP will continue to collect and maintain a library of related materials for the use of SRRP and others working on agricultural problems.

2. SRRP will continue to provide speakers to groups interested in its direct action projects and investigative material.

RE: 1968 Survey for Dallas County, Alabama

SRRP will conduct this new revised survey exclusively in Dallas County, Alabama where we plan to interview the head of every single black farm family. Time expected-one year.

The new survey contains certain items which we bring to your attention.

Questions 35 and 36 detail the exact diet of farm Negroes and the results should introduce proof of the extent of malnutrition up to now unknown in the United States.* For example:

| Food | Wkly | Mthly | Yrly | Snly | Amt. of Food | Raise or Grow | Store Brought |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Chicken breasts, legs, thigh, wings | | 4 | | | 1/12 | ✓ | |

indicates that chicken is eaten 4 times a month, that the chickens are home raised and that one chicken is divided 12 ways each time it is eaten.

SECTION III - Miscellanous - details the total income and expenses of a farm family. It is our experience that the poverty of black families is far greater and income far lower than the Census figures.

Questions 5a,18a,18b,23,30,$69,74-76 "trigger off" insertions on index cards for action on the part of SRRP on behalf of those not receiving benefits they are entitled to under the various programs.

Of course, the questions in detail about agriculture food, and welfare programs are continued.

We welcome your comments.

---

*In the 1967 Clark-Kennedy Senate hearing on "Hunger and Malnutrition in America," Dr. Stewart of the U. S. Public Health Service states "No. We do not know the extent of malnutrition anywhere in the United States."

OPEN LETTER

The Right Honorable Lester G. Maddox
State Capitol
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Governor Maddox:

We as Georgians, students and citizens of the new South are vitally concerned about our state and region. In uncompromising affirmation of "the right of each person to speak out," in affirmation of the "right of dissent," we are compelled to speak to a crucial issue facing all of us--the future of education in Georgia.

In your Inaugural Address, you pledged to build a "system of education adequate to the needs of the twenty-first century...and available to every youth capable of profiting by it." By severely cutting education expenditures, you have reversed your position of political and economic progress.

We demand that you be faithful to your pledge.

As long ago as 1963, the Governor's Commission on Higher Education completed their survey of the university system of Georgia. They called for a state expenditure of $103,000,000 for the 1967-1968 school year. This amount was needed simply to keep the system's head above water. An additional $13.6 million per year was called for if higher education were to advance. Governor Sanders cut this back to $10 million per year; you cut it still further to $5 million. Higher public education in Georgia looks almost a lie.

> 451,000 Georgians are college age, less than 80,000 go to college.
> In the Armed Forces Qualifying Test to determine "eligibility" for military service, 41.2% failed, against a national average of only 20.2%
> The average white Georgian has no more than 10.3 years of school. The average black citizen has no more than 6.1 years of school.

Georgia education is in a crisis.

Our primary concern in writing is not with the impact of educational stagnation on business and scientific interests, great though that impact will be. We are politically motivated students working toward the establishment of a freer intellectual and cultural climate in the South. The necessary and long overdue social changes called for in the South cannot be accomplished outside the development of enlightened centers of unfettered inquiry and active criticism. The movement for progressive social change in Georgia must fight to protest and improve the university system if that movement is to grow and prosper. The simple restoration of the Commission's proposal is not enough. We will not be bought off. Our vision for education is larger than the construction of a few classrooms, new science libraries, and business administration buildings. We work for the time when all people in the state--no matter their race, creed, or economic class--will have free and equal access to as many years of education as they might want. The future demands tuition-free state colleges and universities and scholarships for any high school students who otherwise could not stay in school.

We demand more money for education. The leaders of our society do not have this vision; they are not prepared to allocate the needed funds. So in an economy of lavish, if not sickening abundance, we escalate defense spending and make even more problematic the question of whether there is much to defend.

Even an unlimited amount of money, wrongfully given and improperly spent, will not build the New South. If money is given to silence rather than to free the university, the students, Georgia, and the South will lose. If students think education is a privilege to be conferred on a select few, instead of a right to be provided for all, they have been bought off. Southerners, students and workers alike, must learn from the Black Power Movement that the only way people achieve justice and freedom is by working for it and demanding it.

We trust that students all over the state will take whatever action they feel appropriate to demonstrate their solidarity in opposition to your educational cutback. To be in good faith, you must meet such demonstrations with approval, for we want to build a New South.

Unless Georgia education gets the money it deserves, beginning with the restoration of the $8.6 million cutback, we will call for Georgia students to mount a continuing campaign of pressure by whatever means necessary.

We await your response.

Respectfully,

Atlanta Chapter-at-Large

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'?

ARKANSAS

Little Rock, Arkansas: A southern mountains peace walk, scheduled to pass through a five-state area, will get underway in Little Rock on Feb. 3. The project, initiated by members of the Committee for Nonviolent Action, is to be an individual rather than an organizational undertaking, with emphasis on personal contact and consideration of the basic questions of nonviolence and human relations. The participants, numbering less than ten, will be seeking opportunities to visit community groups, colleges, schools, and churches. The scheduled route, subject to change, includes Little Rock; Memphis and Nashville, Tennessee; Lexington and Ashland, Kentucky; Huntington and Charleston, West Virginia; Richmond, Virginia; and Washington, D. C. Communication with the peace walkers will be handled by New England CNVA, Rt. 1, Box 197 B, Voluntown, Connecticut 06384.

FLORIDA

A tour of several Florida schools and cities is planned for the last of February and the first of March. Prospective speakers include Nancy Hodes, of SCEF's Operation Open Debate, David Nolan, SSOC, and Tom Gardner, NSA Southern Project. The focus of the program will be the foreign policy of the U.S., particularly in regard to China, Southeast Asia, and South America; its effect upon the individual; the draft laws; and the complicity of the university in formulating and executing foreign policy. Contact: Tom Gardner, NSA Southern Project, 41 Exchange Place, Room 703, Atlanta, Georgia 30303.

Gainesville: Plans are underway at the University for a Florida Days of Protest during the week of March 18-26. Activities being considered include teach-ins, speakers, peace parades, and a peace marathon which would involve delegations moving in relay fashion from town to town, climaxed by a march into Fort Lauderdale during the Easter vacation.

Other activity of the Gainesville left focuses upon a "National Security Seminar" scheduled to be held at the University in the near future under the chairmanship of the President of the University. In a mode contrary to the seminar concept, there will be no opportunity for questions, dialogue, or refutation of the ideas presented at the gathering. University students fear the use of the program for rightist propaganda under the official auspices of the University, and are planning some type of counter-seminar in protest. Contact: Nik Levin, Box 13636, University Station, Gainesville, Florida.

Tallahassee: Students at Florida State University met recently to form a SSOC chapter. They hope to recruit members from other Tallahassee colleges and become a city-wide group. Projected activities include the running of campus political party candidates on a university reform platform. SSOC and the Young Liberals plan to coordinate and man freedom schools in conjunction with the second NAACP-sponsored school boycott on Jan. 30, 31, and Feb. 1. Contact: Phil Mullins, 439 West College Avenue, Tallahassee, Florida 32301.

GEORGIA

A delegation of Emory University and Georgia State College students, representing the Atlanta Chapter of SSOC, presented Governor Maddox's Executive Secretary an open letter protesting the scarcity of funds for education in Georgia. (See "Open Letter," pages 1 and 2.) They have contacted campuses across the state on this issue, and are presently circulating a statewide petition. Those interested should contact Jody Palmour, 1580 Dantzler, Apt. 2, Atlanta, Georgia.

NORTH CAROLINA

Chapel Hill: An hour-long silent vigil protesting the war in Vietnam began on Jan. 4 and will continue on a weekly basis until the war ends. Sponsored by the Friends Meeting of Chapel Hill, the vigil drew 120 participants, whose numbers were made up of professors, undergraduate and graduate students, businessmen, and housewives. By Jan. 18 this number had grown to 170. The leaflet of the peace vigil reads simply: "Until Americans stop killing and being killed in Vietnam: a silent vigil every Wednesday noon to express our sorrow and our protest."

VIRGINIA

Charlottesville: Students at the University are making plans to begin publishing an independent weekly newspaper. The paper is conceived as a way of introducing moderate and liberal students to different points of view on issues both within and outside of the academic community. Contact: Howard Romaine, 405 Altamont St., Charlottesville, Va.

The hearing on the case of John Buenfil, charged with failure to report for military induction, has been postponed until Feb. 2, in order to allow Buenfil sufficient time to secure a lawyer.

Richmond: On Jan. 6, 7, and 8, a group of 60-75 students gathered to hear various speakers, including representatives of the NAACP, AFL-CIO, ACLU, the Virginia Council on Human Relations, and the Charlottesville poverty program, as well as liberal Virginia educators and politicians. Discussion centered around the social and political conditions in Virginia and possible methods for change. A second meeting is planned for Feb. 11-12 at which specific plans for action will be formulated. Summaries of the conference are available upon request. Contact: Patti Marella, Box 2662, Mary Washington College, Fredericksburg, Virginia.

VANDERBILT STUDENT SHOT AND KILLED BY POLICE

Nashville, Tennessee: A first-year graduate student at Vanderbilt University, Ramsey Windley Hall, was shot and killed by policemen on Jan. 18. Hall's landlady had called police to report that he was acting strangely and beating on the door to his room. Three policemen sent to investigate approached Hall's room and were asked by him for a search warrant. Hall then came out of his room and pushed his landlady down the stairs. He began struggling with the three policemen and was knocked unconscious by one of them. The student regained consciousness quickly and, already partially handcuffed, began struggling again. The policemen began hitting Hall with their nightsticks, one of which splintered on his head. When Hall picked up the broken nightstick and started advancing on the police, one of them pulled his gun and began firing. Hall was struck in the chest, throat, and stomach by six bullets. He died immediately.

More than 1,400 Vanderbilt students and professors have signed a petition calling for an investigation of the incident as well as a thorough reevaluation of the entire police department.

Several city groups have issued statements deploring the killing and maintaining that this is but one of a long series of incidents indicating improper police training and a resulting hostile attitude of policemen toward the public. The ACLU, the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, the NAACP, the Nashville Community Relations Council, SSOC and Vanderbilt Student Association raised these issues in a meeting with Mayor Beverly Briley

MIGRANT UNREST

by Nan Guerrero

Since last spring, the Industrial Union Department (IUD) of the AFL-CIO has been working with Florida migrants in an attempt to create a counterpart to the organizing of farm workers in California, spearheaded by Caesar Chavez. SSOC recruited seven students who spent the summer working full-time with IUD organizers, traveling to migrant camps along the east coast and in the Great Lakes region and spreading the idea of a union among the workers who would return to Florida in the fall.

Back in Florida, IUD organizers have spent the fall contacting workers, organizing meetings, and laying the groundwork for the building of a union. Their efforts have been coordinated with those of liberal church and civic groups in the state concerned with the plight of the farm worker. The Farm Workers Committee of Florida has been organized and is soon to be incorporated.

During the first week of January, twenty women walked out of a celery field near Belle Glade, Florida over a dispute with the farmer and labor contractor about wages. Apparently the women were promised one wage rate before they got on the bus to go to the field and were told when they got off the bus at the field that they would receive a different lower rate for harvesting the celery.

When the women struck, Tommy Martin, one of the student participants in the summer student-labor project and now a staff member of the IUD, went immediately to Belle Glade to work with the protestors. In a confrontation, Martin was struck in the face by the labor contractor and subsequently pressed charges, which were rapidly dismissed by a Belle Glade judge.

Word of this incident spread rapidly through the migrant community and the strike in the field grew to involve more than 2,000 workers. It was known as a "general workers' holiday" and was planned as a brief strike in a show of unity and strength against the farmers. According to the Belle Glade police chief, the strike was 90% effective and the growers suffered monetarily to some extent. After two days out of the fields, the strikers returned to work with the plan being to call a general strike within ten days if the farmers did not appear willing to negotiate.

At this point, the growers seem somewhat open to talking terms and the ten-day deadline has been extended. However, the possibility of a large strike within the next month is very likely. More than 250,000 people have signed up with the union since the strike activity began and there is a mood of real militance among the workers.

The workers' demands center around shorter working hours, show-up pay, insurance coverage, check-off, job security, and dignity on the job. Though the situation varies according to the region of the state, the crop being picked, and the season, most Florida migrant workers receive less than $10 per day for a 12-hour day, getting on the buses at 5:30 am and returning home at 5:30 pm. Workers are often contracted to do a job, arrive at the fields, and are told to wait, without pay, for days or weeks for the crop to ripen. The demand for show-up pay would obligate the grower to begin paying wages on the date for which he contracts workers to begin picking. Adequate insurance coverage is a necessity as statistics show that agricultural work has the third highest accident rate of the nation's industries. Check-off would require the grower to allot directly to the union from wages the dues of every union member. It is a must for the survival of any union. An over-riding concern of the workers is that they be guaranteed dignity on the job. The Florida migrant force is made up largely of Negroes and the nationwide prejudice against migrants is compounded by elements of the most blatant racism.

Should a general strike occur in the near future, and that possibility is great, the workers will need supportive action from the outside. Following the first two-day strike, ten people who were blacklisted by the farmers have been working as full-time organizers with no pay or means of support. In a massive strike, this problem will be multiplied one hundred-fold. As part of their preparation for a possible strike, workers are making advance rent payments and stocking up food supplies.

Groups should begin organizing now to implement the workers' efforts. In the event of a strike, there will be no time to waste in setting up a structure for support. The important groundwork must be done now in order that the crucial food supplies and donations can be raised and sent at a moment's notice. The organizers are anxious to establish contacts and begin corresponding now with groups who may be able to provide support in the form of food, money, letter writing, telegrams, and demonstrations. Contact: Tommy Martin and Mike Lozoff, United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, P.O. Box 703, Belle Glade, Florida, phone: (305) 996-7475.

LYNCHING LEGAL STYLE

by Janet Dewart

"My life is at stake! I'll say what I please."
---Charles W. Elliott

Law and justice have again reigned supreme. Once more a nigger has received his just reward for touching a white woman. Or as headlines blazed in the Nashville Tennessean, NEGRO RAPIST GIVEN CHAIR. Good. Now he can join the other six prisoners who await execution in the Nashville penitentiary.

Funny thing about the color of"justice." All seven men on death row are black. And it seems that the last man executed in Tennessee was black. Seems that he was also convicted of raping a WHITE woman. Another headliner.

Two years ago, five black men were on death row for the same charge. Through massive protest about capital punishment, their death sentences were changed to life imprisonment. Pardon is the legal term for an act which came after the legal intimidation of death was used to place fear in the black community. Rats, poor education, shacks and outside unsanitary toilets have not taken a high enough toll.

Charles Elliott, the latest victim of Tennessee justice, was ordered by the judge to restrain himself when Elliott shouted, "That's not true!" to the prosecuting attorney's closing argument. "My life is at stake! I'll say what I please," was Elliott's reply. Criminal Court Judge William O. Beach ordered Elliott from the courtroom and recessed the trial for 15 minutes. The Nashville Tennessean (Jan. 18, 1967) reported that Elliott was returned and made no further outbursts while Bagwell (the prosecuting attorney) concluded his summation. Must have law and order. Respect for a system trying its best to smother you in the ghettoes, sacrifice you on the front lines in Vietnam, and welfare you to death.

What convicted Charles W. Elliott? The evidence? Hardly. The papers reported one side of the story. But an interview with Attorney Roscoe Hamby, one of Elliott's attorneys, gave information that was reported during the trial but failed to reach the papers.

Hamby said that the testimony of doctors who examined Mrs. Byhilia Huddleston five hours after the rape supposedly took place said that their evidence showed that she had not been sexually molested.

The papers reported that samples of flower particles found in Elliott's trousers matched golden rods found at the scene of the attack. Trial evidence proved that the soil on Mrs. Huddleston's clothing did not match the kind found on Elliott.

The forty-five year old mother of six also testified that her attacker made her disrobe. After the supposed rape, she was then choked unconscious and was found stumbling along the highway six-tenths of a mile from the scene of the crime, completely dressed except for her shoes. When asked how she was able to dress completely in a semi-conscious state, she claimed "absence of recall." During the trial Mrs. Huddleston said that she could not positively identify her attacker. (Guess all black men look alike.) But she did recall that her assailant had a moustache and wore a narrow-brimmed hat. Defense witnesses testified that Elliott has never worn a moustache.

Let's add the ingredients that justify taking a black man's life: (1) Insufficient evidence; (2) Absence of recall; (3) Hysterical testimony of one WHITE woman.

Twin Injustice

The Elliott case is nauseatingly similar in tone to the Wansley trial in Lynchburg, Virginia. Southern Conference Educational Fund reports that authorities there are continuing their four-year effort to execute 21-year-old Thomas Wansley, a Negro, on rape charges. The case began four years ago when Wansley was accused of raping a Japanese woman, and raping and robbing a white woman. He was convicted on all three counts, although he testified that he had previously had sexual relations with the Japanese woman and although the white woman could not positively identify him at the first trial.

He was given two death sentences plus a 20-year jail sentence on the robbery charge. The Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals overturned the convictions and ordered new trials in 1964, after statewide and national protests about Wansley's treatment.

Only 17 when the case began, Wansley has spent the last four years in prison, including 18 months on death row. He is still facing two capital charges. During the same period, a white man who was convicted of raping an 11-year-old Negro girl was sentenced to five years in prison. He has already been released.

It is important to note that during the period between 1930 and 1964, over 500 black men in the South have been executed for the charge of raping white women, convicted largely on the testimony of one woman and the persecution of the court which makes certain that the black community is kept in its place through fear and legal intimidation. Less than fifty white men have been convicted of similar crimes.

Taking these two cases together, it should be obvious that the charge is not rape, but being black. The bloodstained glasses of southern justice see only in black and white.

What To Do

Several individuals in Nashville are initiating protests about the Elliott case and the general crime of capital punishment. An anti-capital punishment bill will be presented to this session of the state legislature.

Hopefully Virginia groups interested in human rights will protest the injustices of the Wansley trial. Inquiries about this particular case should be sent to Southern Conference Education Fund, 3210 West Broadway, Louisville, Kentucky. SSOC will answer inquiries about the Elliott case.

VIETNAM: CLERGYMAN'S DILEMMA

Clergymen and laymen throughout the country have received a call to "Vietnam: The Clergyman's Dilemma, an Education-Action Mobilization," to be held January 31 to February 1, 1967 in Washington, D. C. Since many SSOC members and friends will be interested in hearing about and participating in this activity, we reprint for your convenience the call, the agenda, the sponsors, and the southern contact list of "Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam."

"A Call to 5,000 Clergymen"

Scripture warns that "Where there is no vision, the people perish." The failure of vision regarding Vietnam is a blindness to realities no less than to ideals. The threat of this moment is a preoccupation with the enemy that destroys our society's power to understand itself or its foes. In such a time leaders in the religious community of this nation must risk the displeasure of the powers that be in order to challenge dogmatisms that imperil ourselves and our world.

We want YOU in Washington with us on January 31-February 1 to gain new insight for local involvement through workshops, to meet with both elected and appointed government officials, and to stand with members of all faiths in a vigil for peace.

CLERGYMAN'S DILEMMA (con'td from pg. 14)

Purposes of the Mobilization

Sponsors of the Mobilization list the following three purposes for the mobilization:

(1) Workshops related to the Vietnam crisis will aim at assisting clergy in areas of preaching, draft counseling, political action, developing community concern, etc.

(2) A vigil against the war by members of all faiths will be an outward sign of our inner anguish and penance ("I should like to be able to love my country and still love justice").

(3) We will meet with elected and unelected government officials regarding the war and, specifically, the enormous allotments of funds being allocated to this war which "nobody wants."

Sponsors will provide free housing for all those who bring a sleeping bag or the equivalent. Transportation arrangements will be handled by the southern contact persons listed below. Don't hesitate to call on them if you want further information.

THE CHILDREN OF VIETNAM

"A million children have been killed or wounded or burned in the war America is carrying on in Vietnam. Not many of them even get to hospitals,but if they do, they may lie three in a bed or on newspapers on the floor. Flies are in the wounds. Materials for the adequate treatment of burns--gauze, ointments, antibiotics and plasma--are usually non-existent. This contrasts with the incredible speed and efficiency with which American troops napalmed by mistake are given elaborate first aid and flown to a Texas hospital for treatment.

"When Terre des Hommes, a Swiss humanitarian organization, asked for American assistance in flying wounded children to Europe for repair, our officials refused, explaining that children were unhappy when separated from their families. The fact is that a third of all Vietnamese children in institutions have already lost both parents or been abandoned. Can America, which manufactures and delivers the efficient napalm that causes deep and deforming burns, deny all responsibility for their treatment?"

PEACE CALLED WAR

LYNDON JOHNSON'S POVERTY PROGRAM

by David Nolan

In 1964 when Lyndon Johnson was playing liberal and posing as a peace candidate, he called his goal "The Great Society" and outlined several of its component parts. But as the work of the Great Defoliator became more and more demanding, the Great Society programs went out the window.

To speak of the War on Poverty at this time may be to kick a dead horse, but for the record, we might discuss some of the reasons why it failed.

We must first examine the context in which it was created. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. has written that Lyndon Johnson is "compelled by a malign fate to struggle with problems beyond his intellectual interest or control." Johnson entered politics in the 1930's as a New Dealer. He had repeatedly voiced his admiration for Franklin D. Roosevelt and it can be assumed that he would like to follow FDR's path to greatness.

To quote Schlesinger again, "he knows that a great president must do great things, but unlike the Roosevelts or Wilson or Kennedy, he does not know what those great things should be." So rather than develop great new ideas himself, Johnson has borrowed from the ideology of the New Deal and applied his legislative skills to getting bills passed that are thirty years old in their conception. These laws, tailored to another age and not taking important changes into account, have not sufficed.

The Office of Economic Opportunity, the bureaucratic embodiment of the War on Poverty, then, suffers from problems of conception and scope as well as the publicized failures in implementation.

Conception

The poverty program is designed to fit people into a society that is seen as basically good--whose only fault is that it does not yet extend its benefits to everyone. Working from this basic assumption of superiority, the goal is to change people rather than society in sort of a mass psychoanalytical approach. It has no provision for giving people money directly, but rather concentrates on teaching them skills, which it is assumed will make them qualified for existing jobs. Or it tries to make the conditions of poverty more liveable by such devices as recreation centers.

One of the tragedies of the program is that people who have been retrained have not been able to find jobs, or else were only able to find marginal jobs that will no longer exist in five years because of automation. Are we then to force people to undergo retraining every five years? It is a truism that businesses are reluctant to hire people over 40 or 45 anyway, so then what do we do?

Poverty vs. Powerlessness

In order to understand OEO, we must differentiate between the problems of poverty and the problems of powerlessness. As the law was written, providing for "maximum feasible participation of the poor," it could conceivably affect the latter, and to the extent they are related, the former as well. This, however, is working on a result rather than a cause of poverty. Even so, it is possible that this would be better than nothing.

Think, for instance, of a small southern town, divided 50-50 racially, where the whites own all the businesses, most of the land, and hold all the public offices. If an OEO community action program were set up in this town controlled by the poor (most, if not all of whom would be Negro because of the refusal of whites to participate) it could in many instances be a counter government financed by the federal government, and would certainly be a source of power to the poor. If white banks refused to loan Negroes the capital to set up businesses, this could be done through the poverty program. If the white school board refused to allow the teaching of Negro history, a poverty program could be set up to teach it to adults and children. If Negroes constantly caught the short end of white justice in the courts because of inadequate legal aid, the poverty program could provide sympathetic legal assistance for them. Negro cooperatives and credit unions could be set us with poverty program financing as a means of offsetting white economic control.

But these possible radical implications of the poverty program did not escape the attention of white southerners bent on preserving their privileges. The poverty program could equally be used to preserve the status quo, to further consolidate white power, and to provide tremendous profits, direct and indirect, to white businessmen. It all depends on who controls the poverty program. Money might be used to start a Negro cooperative or credit union, or it might be used to build a community center on land owned by a white man, with building materials from a local white firm, providing jobs for local whites.

Implementation

It is a sad commentary that given these alternatives, the Office Of Economic Opportunity, under political pressure, decided to discard the provision for "maximum feasible participation of the poor" and permit local poverty programs to be run by whites who profited from poverty by owning slums, underpaying workers, gouging debtors, and the like. This is the built-in contradiction of the War on Poverty.

The poverty program in Brunswick County, Virginia is an example. Brunswick County is 60% Negro. 80% of the Negroes and 40% of the whites earn less than the government's poverty level of $3000 a year. By any standards, the poverty program should have been run by Negroes and by those earning less than $3000 a year. However, when Brunswick Community Action, Inc. was set up, 19 of the directors were white, 11 were Negro, and none earned less than $3000. The process of democracy was satisfied by having the all-white County Board of Supervisors appoint the Negro representatives in BCA, with predictable results.

Petitions with over 500 names were sent to Washington to protest this situation and an OEO investigator came to Brunswick County. He talked first with the whites, and then, rather than consult the Negroes, he went to a white civil rights worker to find out the opinion of the Negro community. The man from OEO said that the racial balance in BCA could not be changed because then the whites would refuse to participate. When the "maximum feasible participation" section of the law was brought up, he said that he considered one or two (out of 30) to be "strong minority group representation". When asked if he considered whites to be a minority group in Brunswick County (since they form only 40% of the population), the investigator became flustered and left.

It was obvious from that point on that OEO was not concerned to see a meaningful poverty program in Brunswick County. It was found that an OEO employee in Washington was feeding information and names of Negro protestors to the whites of BCA, whose reputation was hardly sterling, was appointed a state official of OEO. Compromises which were later made in BCA were in the direction of giving Negroes more token representation but never control of the program as they should have had.

CDGM

Recent developments with the Child Development Group of Mississippi are another example. CDGM was organized by SNCC workers and has been recognized as one of the most effective programs in the country in terms of involving the poor in the poverty program. But this was severely frowned upon by Senators Stennis and Eastland, who promised to raise havoc with congressional appropriations if CDGM was not stopped. What was OEO's response? Did they defend this highly successful program?

An article in the New York Times on October 4, 1966, gives a clue to OEO's actions:

> Clarence C. Ferguson, Dean of the Howard University Law School, has complained to Sargent Shriver, director of the poverty agency, that some of his students, working as summer employees of the agency, had been "misused" in connection with the Mississippi investigation.
> Several of these students reported that they had been instructed to disguise themselves in their "movement clothes"--dress that would identify them with a civil rights organization--and find derogatory information about CDGM.

The subsequent renewal of the CDGM grant was the result of pressure by its supporters, including Walter Reuther's Citizen's Crusade Against Poverty, and the National Council of Churches. Without its powerful supporters, CDGM would have been crushed by the no-so-sonscientious poverty warriors of OEO.

The Other War

Those who are students now have lived all their lives in the Cold War. This is the period where the politics of fear developed the balance of terror, where men like Herman Kahn calmly calculate the difference between 40 million deaths and 80 million deaths, where over half the national budget goes for "defense", and where we live in a "permanent war economy". Fred J. Cook has written a book calling America The Warfare State.

It is not surprising that in this period the military terminology has come into wide use, and that the justification for actions has been presented in terms of the "national defense". Thus, when money was desired for higher education in 1958, the bill was called the National Defense Education Act, and was justified because more education made America a mightier nation, not because education was a good thing in itself.

Similarly, for several years, one of the arguments for civil rights was that racism tarnished America's image with the nonwhite countries of the world and gave the communists a propaganda trump--rather than saying that racism was wrong in and of itself, whether the world approved or disapproved.

So we should not be surprised to see the poverty program cloaked in the military terminology of a "war on poverty", nor should we be surprised that Adam Yarmolinsky, while in the Defense Department, was one of the architects of the poverty program, nor should we be surprised that there is still a close relationship between the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Department of Defense.

Time magazine recently redefined the American Dream in the following terms: "the armed forces remain the model of the reasonably integrated society that the U. S. looks forward to achieving in another generation."

Since the Office of Economic Opportunity is concerned with the fulfillment of the American Dream, it is not, then, out of place for the Job Corps to train people to the point where they can qualify to be drafted, or for the Defense Department to allot 10% of its contracts to poverty areas to provide jobs in America's biggest business, and it is justifiable to fire VISTA volunteers who inquspiciously protest the war in Vietnam.

The Problem of Relevance

In the final analysis, the question we must consider is whether the poverty program, with its conception firmly based in the thinking of the 1930's, is relevant to the problems of today which are being influenced and will increas-

The economist Robert Theobald has written: "We must comprehend that the emergence of the cybernated era based on full education means the end of the industrial age based on full employment." In other words, our present concept of full employment is on the way out--"The drive to provide toil is obsolete...the true challenge is to educate people in such a way that they can live a life which will appear meaningful to them, and to their fellow-men."

The poverty program is geared, if anything, to a society where there is a direct relationship between work and income. But through the process of cybernation, most of the presently existing jobs and be taken over by machines, and increasingly this will be done. The problem then is how to distribute income when it is no longer necessary for people to work in the sense we now know it. A guaranteed annual income seems the most reasonable proposition--where the profits from the work done by the machines is divided up among the people, with a constitutional guarantee (to prevent political hanky-panky) that each person will have enough to live on.

We see, then, that even if OEO were to perform its job satisfactorily, it does not have the necessary scope to meet the great technological changes that will shape America's future. And these changes will make irrelevant the work of the poverty program.

A PLEA

FOR JOHN LOVE
SELMA SNCC, 1964

Strange an era to be born into,
when a student, seeking wisdom, is told that no one has it.

In other times, everyone said they had it.

Those who do have it today must be lying,
or silent.
Is that the difference?
I do not believe them;
I hear their silence.

So strange a time when wisdom flowers in old abandoned orchards, or at the bottom of deserted mine shafts in Kentucky, or behind the wheel of certain half-dismantled chevrolets carrying Negroes, driving through central Alabama in the terrifying night.

NATIONALIZING OUR RESOURCES

by Philip Young

Nationalization of America's natural resources is not the kind of an issue around which concerned people are rallying. It does not move people to action as does racial or economic injustice; it has driven no one out of the country or to jail, as has America's military injustice. But the damnable thing about many of the social, economic, or military wrongs in this nation is that their current manifestations are more temporarily than permanently relevant to humanity.

A growing number of Americans, however, representing both the scientific elite and the poorest white mountain resident of Kentucky and West Virginia, are alarmed at the extensive corruption of what most of us have always taken for granted--the physical world around us.

Upsetting the Natural Balance

For the scientist, and to an increasing extent the federal planner, random technological advancement is the most frightening thing we must face in the near future. There is no random way of dealing with our physical environment. To the contrary, there are delicate balances and natural forces which scientists now believe are upset only at great costs to all of life. Unfortunately, we have paid no attention to these balances. Lake Erie is a magnificent cesspool; the air over our major urban centers is substantially poisonous.

An increased demand for coal to feed power plants continues to threaten the very existance of thousands of families in Appalachia who happen to live in those areas where strip-mining now goes on. During the winter months, story after story is told of immense earth slides that carry away roads, fields, and occasionally inundate homes. All year round, sulphur-stinking water flows into wells and streams sickening people, killing wildlife, and destroying tomorrow's resources.

Why Nationalization?

There are at least two significant reasons why full consideration should be given to the nationalization of our resources. First, because there is mounting concern among citizens and scientists, the federal government is going to do something about water and air pollution very soon. Without some real protest, this federal regulation will be only that which is acceptable to the industrial concerns affected by controls. In his 1967 message to the industry, Joseph Moody, President of the National Coal Policy Conference, Inc., indicated very clearly that the coal industry--both labor and management--is determined not to let the Department of Health, Education and Welfare "force on the nation an air pollution abatement program far more strict than medical evidence justifies and without due regard to..... what their affect may be upon various fuel industries, such as coal."

From the automobile industry, and the drug industry, to name two of the more flagrant examples of industrial meddling in the setting of Federal standards, we have long since learned that industry has little concern for the best, long-range interests of the people, let alone their physical health and safety. It seems to me that a different premise must be injected into all of the discussions about pollution: all of the natural resources in this nation belong to the people. This means that no right of private ownership exceeds the right of the people to the best use of all their resources. It is quite clear that national planning is absolutely essential, whether we are talking about using our land to feed the world, or simply about using our air to draw a safe breath.

The Second Reason

Secondly, no issue comes closer to being critical to the rural poor than the use of the land on which they live. If America is to be serious about rural poverty, it must recognize that there is a clear relationship between the land and the people who live on it. Understanding the people trapped in poverty in rural areas requires an understanding of their sense of belonging to the land.

To know that major floods occur in the mountains regularly, and that minor flooding is a semi-annual problem, is to recognize that we have not taken seriously either the people who live in these areas or the billions of gallons of water that are annually wasted by floods. It may be legal for strip miners to deprive families of the use of their land without remuneration or due process of law; but it is also wrong.

Successful organizational attempts in Appalachia must reflect these issues, or they will be irrelevant to the people who live in that region. Poor schools, inadequate health facilities, political chaos, no job opportunities, as intolerable as they may be, are not the kinds of issues to which poor white mountaineers are now responding. But they do have a sense of relationship to the land upon which they live, and an understandable horror of rising water or sliding mountains. If the people and the natural resources are related, it must be made clear that the people's rights exceed the broad-form deed in face, as well as in theory.

Fairytale

I am well aware of the gap between morality and legality in America. If that were the only critical issue here, it could be bridged by simply legalizing what is apparently moral. Industry and government could be called upon to act responsibly in dealing with all of America's natural resources; and because they represent a portion of the people, they could be relied upon to deal fairly with the future of all the people and their resources.

The Real Crisis

Even swallowing that crass fiction, America's larger problem has always been a massive disjunction between what is right and what is economically and politically possible. Nothing less than the crisis which we have unwittingly brought upon ourselves--the impending collapse of the physical atmosphere in which we live--can make us deal realistically with the whole matter of what is right for America's future.

A suffocating thermal inversion over Los Angeles, the total pollution of Lake Michigan, the destruction of a mountain town in West Virginia by flood or mud, any major failure of our natural environment can no longer be considered as only remote, isolated possibilities.

National Values

Some concept of national planning, built upon social values, is absolutely necessary. And the crisis in our use of natural resources provides the occasion for working toward that end.

And even if this were not so, the misuse of natural resources comes closest to being the natural issue around which the rural poor will organize.

NEOCOLONIALISM IN THE THIRD WORLD

by Jody Palmour

An early lesson movement people learn is not to judge anything simply by its color. One has to get to know a situation before one can see what's happening.

In our time, freedom is something we do not judge lightly because it is not easy to find or even to see. Those looking at it most passionately are probably preoccupied just now with the Vietnam war and with the policy of our foreign involvements.

The neo-colonialism we see standing out like dilated veins across the face of the free world, describes the political economy of most of the world's hungry masses. Its critical analysis could well point to the way Americans can gain freedom with the rest of the world.

Let's Pretend

Neo-colonialism is essentially the "Let's-Pretend-Game" played on a small under-developed country scale. The rules are that the subject state must assume the appearance of independence with all the appropriate ceremonies and functions--save one. The blindfold or unmarked-dice of the game is that the state can control EVERYTHING about its development except those activities in any way related to its political-economy.

In economic policy matters, the Neo-colonial state is controlled from the outside. And those mainstays of the free world doing the controlling are economic determinists who believe the backbone of political freedom to be free enterprise.

To their minds, any political decision that would encroach on their rights freely to strip the subject state of her natural resources is an attack on the free world (read free enterprise) and is open to their veto. The only free states are the ones encouraging free enterprise or, less euphemistically perhaps, their own rape.

The successful veto is a veto enforced. An early example which we have forgotten --the Chinese haven't. The war was about opium. John Quincy Adams explains:

> The moral obligation of commercial intercourse between nations is founded entirely, exclusively, upon the Christian precept to love your neighbor as yourself...But China, not being a Christian nation...the fundamental principle of (their) empire is anti-commercail...It is time this enormous outrage upon the rights of human nature, and upon the first principles of the rights of nations, should cease.

We must remember that the actual military presence dominating the affairs of the kept state is an extreme situation representing a break-down in the normal functioning of the exploitative machine.

We need to see the engine working efficiently if we are to see the real threat it poses. We need to see the face of unfreedom cleanly shaven and smartly pressed.

Trickle-Down Theory

Neo--colonialism rationalizes itself around the classic "Trickle-Down Theory" of social amelioration. Even the Mellons, Rockefellers or Englehards are probably a little uncomfortable describing their third world activities in terms of monopoly controlled, profit motivation.

They can point with pride to color photographs of great mining sites, tropical plantations and oil derricks, reeling off as they go the number of jobs created and the amount of money injected into the little nation's economy.

What he will not do, though, is outline the terms on which that money was invested or compare the profits taken out with the slight stipend returned and what the difference could mean in the lives of the impoverished.

Small countries aspiring toward independence (and their fractured size and isolation is an integral reason for the ease of their exploitation) must accrue capital as rapidly and as best it can if it is to meet the primal needs of its people. The government's very existence is at stake as expectations rise at the granting of independence.

Development Contracts

Bountiful resources of bauxite, tin, petroleum, etc. would seem ample to provide the initiating capital for a new economy. So the government either signs itself or encourages groups within the country to sign development contracts for those resources hoping to utilize the gained revenue for community development.

What such contracts imply is that the state government has become, in effect, an agent of either a particular firm like Firestone, United Fruit, or Rand Mines, or more probably, of the great combinations of many interrelated and jointly owned corporations like Anglo-American.

Their monopolistic position means that affiliated corporations can dominate individual, if not all the major capital enterprises in a country; can set prices and wages directly (the government cooperates in combatting unions); and can determine taxes and tariffs indirectly.

They can and do schedule the development of a nation's industry for the enrichment of their inter-continental financial empires, not for the principal benefit of the nation's people who built and work those mines and plantations.

They set the terms and the price of the resources leaving the country and of the finished goods returning to the country. All accomplished on this side of the iron curtain. And this pattern of exploitation is most often perpetrated by the freest of all possible worlds--needless to say--us.

Problems in Development

An underdeveloped country faces many of the same problems a developed one does except they are closer to the throat of government. People need income and consumer goods and it is to the government they turn.

The natural path of such a government would be to encourage the development of industry in a way, to maximize its distribution of income and its propagation of other industry in the nation. In other words, socialism and its consequential co-ordinated planning is the most desirable path for the government of an underdeveloped state.

Most governments would follow this route out of self-protection if investment capital were available for the independent development of their resources. But, since the large investment houses dominate the development corporations, no funds are available for political and economic independence.

The government learns to keep the dogs from its throat through various military assistance programs.

Two formulations of the same question are pressed upon us:

Will the exploitating powers be able and willing to channel enough of their profits back into the country to keep up with rising living standard expectations? (Time is all-important. If what could be painlessly granted in ten years is demanded today, revolution occurs.)

Will the insurgent movements demand more than a welfare check from their foreign masters, demand what cannot be given--the popular ownership and management of the mines and factories that are all rightfully theirs?

Ours cannot be an idle concern for the answer.

With the nuclear detente between the great powers, the triggering device for the last war has been dismantled and hidden in the mountains and jungles of one or a combination of the under-developed countries. And the marines are prepared to storm the beaches in search for it.

Time does not permit the luxury of impotent awe before the inter-continental monster with a thousand deceptive faces. The situation of neo-colonialism has determined our task. We must work at home explaining what is happening in the third world. As business grows overseas --the military will grow. Increasingly difficult will be the task of humanizing our own society as military expenditures strain the federal treasury and social development is farmed out to big business. The two hoary heads of government and business are drawing closer together. Their mating breeds facism.

If we picture the beast when its tentacles are cut off, our people won't bleed. Its death throes will uncover ugliness. They might even stab at its heart themselves.

RANGOON

by Richard Butwell

Burma today is as regimented a state as it has probably ever been. Indeed, older Burmese look back on the days of British colonial rule as an era of comparative freedom and prosperity.

"Of course, they do," a young major explains. "They can no longer get all the imported luxury goods to which they became accustomed. They must learn to stand on their own two feet--which is no easy task."

What he did not say was that today's Burmese must ask his ward or village party representative's permission to do the one hundred-and-one things he used to do without asking anybody.

"If somebody stays at my house overnight, I have to tell the party man," a middle-aged Rangoon woman stated. "If my husband wants to buy a shirt, he has to check with the party representative--even if he wants to buy a can of milk!"

Empty Shelves

And the chances are that he will not get his shirt--or his canned milk. For the government-run "People's Shops" are more often than not, empty or scantily stocked. Most of the one-time well-supplied stores in the capital of Rangoon are today shuttered.

Rationing is in effect for most commodities, including rice, and prices are high--in some cases two-and-a-half times what they were four years ago.

One woman wrote in a letter to the government-operated "Working People's Daily" that she used to spend only four kyats (less than a dollar) a day to feed her family. Yet even the cheapest kind of fish today costs eight kyats a viss (the standard Burmese measurement)--"and cannot be had."

One Party Politics

Of political freedom there is practically none. Only one party is permitted-the official Lanzin party, the renamed Burma Socialist Programme Party. It has only 20 members, 13 of whom are the soldier participants in the ruling all-military Revolutionary Council. Of the more than 99,000 "candidate members," one-third belong to the armed forces.

The list of those who have been detained by General Ne Win for one political reason or another reads like a who's who of pre-1962 Burmese public life: former Premiers U Nu and U Ba Swe, Dr. Ba Naw (Burma's titular leader under the Japanese), Brigadier and one-time Socialist politician Aung Cyi (formerly the right-hand man of Burma's present ruler General Ne. Win), ex-Deputy Premier U Kyaw Nyein, and internationally known journalists U Law Yone and U Sein Win--among others.

U Nu was released October 27--together with Ba Swe apparently on the understanding that he go abroad. But Nu's subsequent interview with an Indian reporter strongly suggested that he might resume political activity at an early date.

The Insurgents

The "multi-colored insurgencies," as the Burmese have called them since they began in 1948, continue. The Communist-led National Democratic United Front is probably the largest of these with followers in the field numbering about 2000 (their seemingly eternal strength). The Shans, Burma's most numerous minority, are also partly in revolt against the government but are badly divided. Some Karens belong to the pro-Communist NDUF, but even more probably support the nascent Committee for National Liberation, led by 58-year old former Brigadier Saw Kya Doc and 47-year old Brigadier Bo Yan Naing, son-in-law of Dr. Ba Maw. The CNL, which numbers no more than 500 men as yet, is said to have supporters in the army, but this is most unlikely. Kachin rebels also remain in the field, but the government has extended its authority in this area of the country considerably in the last year.

The fact remains that the government actually governs in the rebel -infested areas only as long as its armed forces are physically present.

Economic Problems

The rebellions cost money--probably more than most people have realized through the years. And they disrupt the government's crash socialist programme--which is in enough trouble without help from the insurrections.

The truth is that Burma is one of the most economically upset states in the world today. Food, clothing, cigarettes and other commodities lie in warehouses while a fairly austere rationing system--austere, that is, for a land of traditional plenty--functions so badly that distribution committees must conduct lotteries when goods exist in shorter supply than their anticipated recipients. A thriving black market exists, and peddlers with unexplained quantities of scarce products are almost daily arrested on the streets.

The problem is largely one of mismanagement, born of inexperience, but there is also no little profiteering taking place even among the proprietors of the "People's Shops."

Controlled Indirection

There is central control, but no central --or other--direction. Some consumers committees direct "People's Shops" proprietors to sell goods only if they have them in sufficient quantity for all would-be buyers. Others advise the managers of such shops--all retail trade in the country having been nationalized--to sell whatever goods they have. Some stores have goods of one sort beyond the ration allowance of their patrons--others have no such goods at all. There is literally nation-wide confusion--this in addition to declining production, and so, export of many of the products on which Burma's livelihood as a country depends.

But none of this is news, of course, to the Burmese--not just because he is experiencing it but also because he reads about such shortcomings in his newspapers daily. And the leader of the country has repeatedly admitted the state of the nation's economy is "very bad."

That leader, wartime resistance hero, General Ne Win, paid visits to the United States and Japan in September.

Very few leaders could leave their country in such circumstances and be assured of returning as leaders (or at all, for that matter).

Even privately, the older upper-class Burmese admit that Ne Win is honest, sincere, and willing to do anything he can to improve the lot of his countrymen.

There is much inconvenience and even some hardship--but not suffering of any significant sort--in Burma today. General Ne Win's nationalization and socialist actions have thrown the economy into turmoil. But nobody blames Ne Win. Indeed, it is widely believed that he will ultimately come up with a solution to the problem.

Support of Ne Win

This popular support of Burma's soldier-leader is more than matched by the loyalty accorded him by his fellow members of the Revolutionary Council and the services' junior officers and enlisted men. A "colonels' revolt" is most unlikely. Nor is there any sign of an overly anxious would-be heir apparent in the military wings.

Least of all is Brigadier Tin Pe a rival of Ne Win's. They are old friends, and Tin Pe is usually left in charge when Ne Win is abroad--which has been frequently the last year-and-a-half--as now. Tin Pe is Trade Minister--the chief architect, with the onetime Communist U Ba Nyein, of the policies which produced the present economic difficulties. Burma's second ranking military officer, Tin Pe, probably could not muster sufficient support within the Revolutionary Council to succeed Ne Win if tragedy or relinquishment of his authority should require this.

Indeed, it is said in Rangoon that Ne Win gave Tin Pe a kind of "last chance" earlier this year to improve things economically by the time he returned from the United States. If not, the story goes, Tin Pe will be pensioned off as ambassador to one or another country. This seems highly unlikely in view of the ties between the two men and General Ne Win's public espousal of as much responsibility as anyone else for the "mess."

Problems of Transition

It is also unlikely, however, that Burma can continue as it is doing today economically. This is not to suggest the imminence of economic collapse. But General Ne Win is endeavoring to build a better Burma and, while he has ended alien domination of the economy, he has not otherwise uplifted the welfare of his countrymen to date.

Ne Win is practical, and he undoubtedly will make some changes of economic policy in the near future. A modest decontrol of trading in locally produced commodities, particularly foodstuffs, is possible--but will have to be carefully managed to avoid the re-entry into retail trading of overseas Indian and Chinese elements still in the country.

An overhaul of the government's pricing system is another possibility--but not one which so far appears to have received much thought among either Revolutionary Council members or government economists. The black market flourishes in part because of the modest prices paid the farmer for his produce by the government. The agricultural peasant also sees no reason why he should engage in extra and harder work--which the government wants him to do--when he benefits so little, if at all, by such labor.

Many of Burma's problems, of course, are those of transition--from a half-hearted only modestly implemented sort of socialism to as vigorous a representative of the species as is to be found in the non-Communist world today (and from an alien-dominated to a Burmese-run economy).

Both changes are momentous ones. It is little wonder Burma is experiencing the economic difficulties it is. The true test of General Ne Win's leadership is still to come--whether he can lead Burma to a victory over these difficulties.

SSOC AND

WHITHER

A LONG HARD LOOK. . .

Ed Hamlett, out-going staff coordinator, presented the following address at the recent Durham membership meeting. Ed has worked with SSOC since its inception and is leaving to return to school.

A review of the history of SSOC reveals several major weaknesses: 1) A reliance on the North; 2) Heavy conference orientation; 3) Drift in community organizing; 4) Over-dependence on SNCC; and 5) Failure to define constituency.

Reliance on North: SSOC has leaned on SDS for programs, ideas, literature; it has looked to the North for speakers, when often there were those here at home who could have done an admirable job; and, finally, virtually all of the financial resources have come from the North and particularly New York City. It might also be argued that we have not recruited sufficiently in the South to maintain a southern born and educated staff, thus forcing SSOC to look northward in this respect as well.

Conference Orientation: There have been at least twelve SSOC-sponsored conferences and seminars since spring, 1964. A major portion of finances have gone into the support of these meetings. Furthermore, the staff has devoted a considerable amount of time to planning, arranging, and travelling in setting up the affairs. This travelling is not thorough campus organizing, but superficial "Paul Revere-type" announcing. Finally, the worst sin is the lack of follow-up to these conferences which take so much of the staff's limited time and the organization's usually scarce resources.

Drift in Community Organizing: By my count SSOC has supported, to some degree or another, six community organizing attempts. One was a candle-making coop in the black community; in two instances we don't know what happened; a fourth died after moderate success; and two of them are still active. Though we received a mandate at the 1966 spring conference to do poor white community work, such an effort has yet to be made.

Over-Dependence on SNCC: In far too many instances SSOC has looked to SNCC for opportunities of involving white moderates in direct action or organizing campaigns. Furthermore, if SNCC seemed to disapprove of our recruiting on Negro campuses, we worried about the consequences if we went ahead with our plans. There were also times when we hoped that SNCC would carry through with its professed plans to organize Negro campuses when we knew that the chances of this happening were not good and when we should have done it ourselves.

Failure to Define Constituency: For most of our existence we have claimed that our desire was to reach the "moderate to radical" active students of the South. What we have found, however, is that we reach neither the moderate nor the radical to any appreciable extent, but those somewhere in between. There is nothing wrong with this if this is what a group decides to do, but we never decided to do that and we were always concerned that SDS got those at one end, and the human relations councils those at the other. This indecisiveness made internal democratic decision-making difficult.

At this point, I would like to list some of the good things about SSOC, as well as indicate instances in which we have moved to correct some of the obvious errors.

SSOC

. . . by Uncle Ed

It is clear to me that SSOC did arise from a movement of students at predominantly white colleges in the South and that a number of these students have provided direction, out of their experience and knowledge, for the organization. The driving force behind SSOC has been southern.

With respect to community organizing, the Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee's project in Southside Virginia remains the only one that I know of in which college students from a state have taken it upon themselves to organize and support a community project which has shown some tenacity. The North Nashville Project, which we were instrumental in starting, is one of the few urban ghetto efforts that has shown some promise.

The New South Student is without doubt an important publication on the American left and is virtually without competition, unfortunately, in the South. While it could certainly be much better, it is important that it be continued.

Generally speaking, SSOC has provided active southerners with a place around which to rally to "do good things." It has raised issues where others were silent and which would not have been raised had SSOC not taken on the task.

Finally, our involvement in the effort to relate concerned students to progressive forces within the labor movement has been a source of encouragement to good folks in the North as well as in the South.

Now that SSOC is a membership organization, there are several things which should be done. First, we could let inertia carry us along as we have been doing. We could merge with SDS as has been urged by some. Or we could chart a new and aggressive program.

To achieve this latter objective we must stop reacting solely to other groups like SDS and SNCC, and continue to build a group of committed Southerners, hopefully into an identifiable Southern New Left that speaks to our ideals about the New South. Internal democracy must be a serious concern if this is to happen. The following are the components of an aggressive program for the organization:

1) The White Community Mandate should be taken seriously. Some members of SSOC are planning a conference on white organizing for February in Washington. SSOC should ask to co-sponsor the conference and help finance it. We should decide to support at least one white community project. Furthermore, SSOC should attempt to act as the secretariat for all white community organizing work in the region. That means acting as coordinator and channel for communication between the various efforts as they emerge, helping to raise money and keeping others informed of the work that goes on.

A second part of the white community involvement should be with the southern church. SSOC must be inventive in confronting the church with its hypocrisy and involving students in the confrontation. While education is important, we should not exclude direct action as a possibility.

SSOC should continue and expand the efforts already begun to engage students in the labor movement. This should include activities on campus in organizing non-academic employees as well as workers in the larger community. Certainly migrants should receive continued attention.

Finally, we should not neglect the middle-class white community. The people working in Atlanta should communicate with others in the South. We must attack racism at all levels. Groups in the North are mounting offensives against prejudice that begins with the school system and the omissions in curriculum that aid this cancer. We can conduct similar campaigns here and students can aid them.

2) The second part of the program should focus on the war in Vietnam and its significance for the South. The results of the National Selective Service exams demonstrate the position of the South in the national educational system. While in the country as a whole about 17% of those tested failed, in the South 48% flunked. Without taking into consideration the elite and protected position of students in our society with respect to the war machine, we can readily see that the war has special consequences for the southern student. This means that a higher percentage of our young men can be drafted out of college, and that to avoid this they will have to go to jail or to Canada, especially since it appears to be considerably more difficult for Southerners to obtain C.O. status than is the case in the North.

Another effect of the war is the reliance of the Southern economy on defense and space spending. Aside from the moral questions involved, the dependence on the whims of the Defense Department and Congress in defense spending is uncomfortable and unhealthy for the communities affected.

Lastly, the effect is very great on the Negro community. There, a young man who can't get a decent job in civilian life and who is constantly emasculated in the jobs he can get is forced into the armed forces where he is trained in guerrilla warfare while fed the propaganda that he is fighting for democracy. It is likely that all of us will have hell to pay when those who return discover that things are no better in the urban ghettoes and rural slums out of which they came.

One of the sad things about the effects of the war is that a campaign to "End the War" could be one of the most frustrating ventures in which we might involve ourselves. It is probably much wiser to set an "End the Silence" as our goal in the South. Our region needs democratic discussion of the war and U.S. foreign policy. These discussions must be based on more facts than we are given in our daily newspapers and in our classrooms.

3) Thirdly, we must not neglect the reform of the university to which we have given so much attention. We need to be considerably more aggressive in this phase of our program than we have been in the past. If speakers have been barred from a college we need to go on that campus with the support of ACLU and AAUP and get arrested if necessary.

We need to set up the speakers' bureau that we have talked so much about. We could cut transportation costs and build a sense of movement and excitement by setting up more tours of stimulating speakers.

In this period of malaise, we must do something to shake people out of their lethargy and depression. To continue as we have been during these days can be disastrous since we do not have a rapidly growing movement with lots of momentum to carry us along. Therefore, we must be even more creative. I hope that some of the suggestions I have offered can be put into effect.

SSOC NEEDS AN

AGONIZING REAPPRAISAL

by Dward J. Toynbee (alias Bob Dewart)

At its recent membership meeting in Durham, SSOC made two decisions, with which I disagree, which will basically affect the future course of the organization. Since I consider no decision to be irrevocable, I will herein voice my objections to these decisions in the hope of starting a movement among the membership to reconsider them by means of a referendum.

I. Salaries

The first issue consists of paying different staff people different salaries. I see this as the complete undermining of the society of equals that I believe SSOC ought to be.

At present all staff members are paid $20 per week salary, which is meant to provide subsistence. In addition to this, it has been the longstanding policy of the organization to pay for travel, housing, and emergency expenses.

In Durham a new perspective was added to the picture. The argument in favor of graduated incomes ran something like this:

(1) In order for the organization to increase its effectiveness, we should outline our programs and establish priorities for them.

(2) Then we allocate a certain percentage of our budget to each program according to its priority.

(3) This done, we go after good staff people to implement the programs. If we want someone who is not willing to work for $20 a week, we offer him whatever (within the limits of our budget) he demands to come on staff. In other words, we buy him.

Since all of a person's really legitimate needs are met under the former staff policy described above, a very interesting rationalization was advanced in favor of the buying procedure.

It was suggested the people have various "life styles," or economic levels of existence. Some people need more money to maintain their life styles than do others, and SSOC should therefore be willing to pay them accordingly.

I would question whether SSOC, or any movement organization, should expend its resources in an attempt to maintain the inflated life style of the American middle class. The proper function for staff salary is to provide subsistence, and $20 a week does this nicely. In fact, I have suggested on several occasions that salaries be reduced to $600 per year ($12.98 a week) so that staff would not have to pay federal income taxes, but this was laughed off.

Middle Class Radicals?

The question we must ask ourselves, is whether we too have not swallowed the middle class ideal. Are we going to demand the material rewards of a materialistic society we claim to oppose? Are we not being caught up in the Madison Avenue-promoted rush to consumption? How many of our needs are genuine, and how many are imposed upon us by clever advertising techniques?

There is much talk among SSOC staff members about finding a radical vocation. Working for SSOC is never even considered. What is sought after is a middle class pay scale for radical activity. People from SSOC gravitate to more lucrative positions with UCM, AFSC, NSA, the IUD or what-have-you, even though their flexibility of action is thereby vastly impaired.

It was suggested at Durham that we make a "quality publication" out of the New South Student by going professional and hiring an editor with credentials, at say $5,000 a year. What basis is there for the assumption that money can buy dedication or ability?

I think that we must decide what our proper position is on the question of property. Should our ideal be to achieve the middle class comforts of life, or should it be the independence from property exemplified by Gandhi ? Should and could SSOC compete for talent in the market of material pleasures? I think not.

II. Organized Labor

A decision-making membership meeting was appended to the educational seminar at Durham in order that SSOC could make programming policy in light of the knowledge gained during three days of learning about the southern economy. How well did this idea work out?

The most impressive resource person that spoke to us was Robert Theobald. His message to the movement was very critical; we have lacked an overall radical perspective on American society; we have too often been guilty of putting our resources into backwater areas (such as rural blackbelts, for example).

The Problem of Cybernation

Theobald's watchword for the future is cybernation, which is an advanced form of automation coupled with computers in which virtually no human labor is necessary. Cybernation will not come over night, but it is even now making archaic the concept of a full-employment economy. A new backwater is about to develop--organized labor--and SSOC had decided to go down with the ship.

SSOC voted at Durham to allow one of its staff members a free hand in spending a large portion of its available funds on labor activities. This was the project, incidentally, that received a priority for hiring staff at accellerated salaries. Have we taken leave of our senses?

Three Objections

Let me list just briefly my three major objections to tying SSOC to organized labor in the South.

First, as mentioned above, we are again putting resources into a backwater area.

Second, organized labor in this country has so much more money than SSOC will ever dream of having, that for us to spend money on them is ludicrous. Labor should be spending money on SSOC, (which it has done to a limited extent, and to which I have no objection).

Third, unions are hardly a radical force in present society. George Meany, who heads the entire AFL-CIO, is a major supporter of the American war of aggression in Vietnam. This is not very surprising. Unions are by nature, from their very conception, first, last, and always, self-interest groups. That is how they are organized; that is how they function. Since the war provides jobs for Americans, it is only natural that the unions should support it, regardless of the moral issues involved.

We must decide how we relate to the American system. One might well imagine from the evidence of the Durham meetings that SSOC had decided that its proper role was to help bring the dispossessed people of the South into the fold of the American system. I would suggest that our proper role is a committment to the overthrow of that system, which exists solely for its own benefit as a parasite upon the rest of the world.

I will outline my proposals for a student movement which comes to grips with the problem of the American system in a future issue of the New South Student.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Steve:

I would like to make two comments about your article, "Working With Liberals" (Nov. 1966 NSS). You state, "the civil rights movement has won nearly all of its battles for legal rights.". This has been one of the major short-comings of the present movement. Having developed the traditional set of legal maneuvers including removal, defense of sit-ins, etc., we have sat back and kind of gone along with your prior statement.

Aside from the remaining litigation on mixed marriage laws, defacto school segregation, teacher tenure, broad academic freedom, and numerous other legal causes, there is the whole field of affirmative suits against white sheriffs, politicians (such as the suit in the Supreme Court against Jim Eastland), etc. which must be explored. More important, however, the radical-liberal movement should be urging the generally finky lawyers to try and show some imagination and explore new legal attacks. The spate of litigation we have just gone through in the early 60's has been generally the judicial versus legislative branch of government.

The last few years, with the advent of the Law Students' Civil Rights Research Council, the New Neighborhood Legal Services groups, etc. has brought massive legal manpower to the cause of the poor, especially by comparison to the pitiful few lawyers we have in the civil rights struggle of the last several years. This new legal manpower should be induced into finding new concepts to now use as judicial power against the power of the executive branch of government.

I must agree whole heartedly with your ideas that the radical elements must not abandon their radicalism, but must also refrain from rejecting society. I have long felt that we must place greater confidence in the freedom of speech and of the press. Perhaps if we would stop pushing our causes so strongly and instead try by some means to induce the people we are trying to reach to explore these issues, they will ultimately conclude what we are saying anyhow. I hate to be naive, but I believe we have to be more subtle.

Sincerely,

Philip J. Hirschkop

STAFF NEEDED

The ranks of the SSOC staff have recently been considerably depleted, and we are looking for capable people who might be interested in working on staff. We are presently looking for a full-time editor for the New South Student, who should have some journalism and movement experience. In addition, we need both office and field workers. Interested persons are urged to contact SSOC, Box 6403, Nashville, Tennessee 37212; Phone: (615) 291-3537.

THE GOOD GUYS (mostly)

BOB BAILEY is a graduate of the University of the South; after an M.A.T. at Harvard,he joined the English faculty of Miles College in Birmingham.

JAMES McBRIDE DABBS is the President of the Committee of Southern Churchmen and past President of the Southern Regional Council. His latest book is Who Speaks for the South?

DAVE DOGGETT, a student at Millsaps College, has lived all over Mississippi, 'cause he's a preacher's kid.

ED HAMLETT, ex-SSOC-staffer, is the slow-ass who got this NSS out late.

J. ANDREW LIPSCOMB is the Program Director of the Committee of Southern Churchmen. He went to Vandy Divinity School and Birmingham S'thern.

JODY PALMOUR, a Georgian, is leaving the SSOC staff to return to Emory.

ED RICHER teaches things at St Cloud State in Minnesota sorta like he did at the University of Florida; while in Gainesville he was a founder of the Free University of Florida.

J.W.S. WISE is a Woodrow Wilson Fellow in Southern history at Univ. of Virginia. He's also SSOC Chairman.

JOHN STRICKLAND, a student at Harvard, is from Savannah, Ga. He was on the White Folks' Project in Miss.

We are grateful to EARL WILSON, who, almost singlehandedly, took care of the production end of this issue.

ABOUT THIS ISSUE: TO BUILD THE ARK

People in and around SSOC have talked for the last three years about "Southerness" but never in a rigorous and systematic way. The editors have tried here to bring together some of the thinking and "feeling" that's been done by a wide range of people, some Southern, some not; some members, and others who aren't.

This issue of The New South Student does not pretend to be a statement of SSOC policy on Southern Identity or Nationalism.

As a systematic attempt to suggest answers or even define the questions surrounding the meaning and political possibilities of working and living in the South, it is easily judged a failure. We think it does succeed, however, as an effort to legitimize the discussion of major issues of personal identity, political strategy and organizational alliances within the context of our own experience in the Movement in the South and within the context of the historical experience of the South as a whole.

But even as an introduction to the major problems facing us in the South, not enough is said about the pressing problem of building a functional relation between the different groups already working here. Mention is made of the broad relation between black and white radical organizations, but while this will ultimately prove the most important strategic question, there is a prior consideration that forces itself upon us: How will the predominately white organizations structurally and programmatically relate to complement each other's work? As distressing as it is to face, SSOC and SDS in the South aren't together. Neither are we adequately 'together' with the Appalachian Volunteers, the University Christian Movement in the South, and other elements of the Southern Left such as the Student Human Relations groups and various independent bodies. The radical identity of all working in the South is needlessly fractured thereby.

We feel that any fruitful evaluation of where the Movement in the South has been and where it's going, both of which considerations are fundamental in the creation of a radical Southern Identity, must face the major structural question of relating local organization to regional and national strategy, planning and resource allocation. Our intentions for this edition have been weakened by the absence of such an evaluation. Hopefully, in-depth discussion of the question of regional strategy and the other questions raised herein will be carried on within SSOC and wherever "good folk" get together to build the Ark.

NATION-MAKING RIGHT AND LEFT

--BY ED RICHER--

There is much poverty of forms in English expository writing: how does one write a congratulatory essay? The theme of Southern neo-nationalism makes me want to express the vitality of the point in a way as latterly new as the concept; I am probably looking for a Southern folk-gesture, and being a Yankee who was "re-born" in the blood of the Southern lamb, I don't know yet what I'm talking about; I don't yet know the folk-medium which this message requires to be revived if it is to be communicated. And by "communication" I don't mean that pallid liberal Anglo-yankee bleep, that lifeless and bloodless idea of message as informational signal; I mean that the message of a sovereign South needs extension into history; it needs a medium, a social corpus vitae! The communication of a political idea presupposes community, and means a hammering and tickling at the recalcitrant human resources from which history is made. The communication of a political idea without historical intentions aforethought is like trying to make babies through masturbation: maybe you can, but it takes more faith than I got!

THE VASECTOMY OF COMMUNICATION

It would be interesting to stop here to speculate why "communication" came to mean something altogether technocratic and ahistorical to the American middle class, why it volunteered for vasectomy. Maybe one reason is that what we here say is truly intended by "communication" is very nearly revolutionary in its understanding of what history-making is all about; the bourgeoisie as we know them cannot endure the idea; for them only technology and science make revolutionary history. For the American liberal, the national culture has no more leaping to do, no more history to make (Senator Eugene McCarthy, liberal extraordinary, announced the other day that as far as he could see there was no further need--ever?--for new legislation in Congress; all that was needed was amendments, the perfection of the structure as it is: a refinement, we suppose, of Title Two of the McCarran Act!): history is to be made only by those "underdeveloped" peoples who are struggling upward through the primeval official past to become like us. (One is reminded of the self-image of perfection among residents in Thomas More's Utopia.)

Perhaps, then, one does not know how to talk about a Southern liberation movement because this culture will not permit us media--even-words!--for the communication of revolutionary--even history-making--intentions. If we want to make history instead of run in ever-more-perfect circles we are presupposed crazy, foreign, alien, or "alienated" (what's the difference?), in effect not able to communicate. But this can be the case only if we accept their idea of communication, play by their rules of history-making, surrender to their definitions of human possibilities. We are safe, I think, in assuming that they are not gods, and so I think history might forgive us the temptation to make a move, a movement, of our own.

A WILL TO LEAP

All that is needed to clear the rim of the box they have lowered us into is a suppleness of spirit, a will to leap; admittedly, the will to make altogether new rules is a mystery, its resources are hidden; but that it is "will" we are talking about is no mystery; its presence in nation-making is inevitable. Of course there are dangers here: the more unprecedented and globally ambitious the national program, the more crudely dependent the message is for its communication on will and will alone. Hence Nazi politics may have been literally impossible, a canvas from the art of the absurd, and therefore the prerequisite for its realization globally was a fashioning of national media so grossly willful, so trusting of will itself, that the effort was (is?) tantamount to a suicidal idea of what a nationalized people is capable of. The boldness of Hitlerism was not in the idea that Germans were Aryan gods whose succor depended upon a global cannibalization, but rather in the idea that by a willful global cannibalization the German people, through such unprecedented national struggle, would make gods of themselves. A will to leap takes a god's morale, more or less, and the possibilities here for self- and national-deception are mysteriously manifold.

A LEFT-WING CONFEDERACY?

Beyond a doubt, with Germany in mind, what needs demonstration is that the will to Southern independence speaks with a richer voice and a more fullsome spirit than that voice or spirit which asks only to escape, by an act of will, the present national shape of the human box. A neo-nationalism, a left-wing confederate spirit, needs to make historical sense; if it is not to be an empty barbaric gesture toward the present it will require a history, a past of its own that once liberated toward creativity becomes a program and a viable future. All new nations discover or invent an unjustly suppressed past the liberation of which justifies the rough struggle that accompanies nation-making. This discovery (we need not invent it!) will not be easy to do, since a lot of Southern leftists are snobbishly anti-intellectual, the young ones especially. I suppose this is the case because they see Afro-Americans as models of revolution, and these white youngsters are so unconsciously racist that they misread the Afro-American as will-without-program, body or rhythm without mind, future without past, a barbaric present. It is little better than White Trash ideology...yet such anti-intellectual communication pervades the Southern New Left, or has up until very recently at least; I hope this movement toward a new Southern sovereignty is a sign of changing times.

WEIGHTS FOR THE BALLOON

It's not just youthful Southern leftists among whites that pose a problem: still active older Southern leftists are U.S.A. nationalists, whether they are Marxists or not. But you can still find a historically relevant ally if you can locate the hibernating leftover of the Southern agrarian: his political tradition is indigenously anti-capitalist, sectionalist, and he is bi-racial in his populism. Once found, recognize him for what he is: a white community base for a Southern insurgency. This rare gem might be made to see that his political tradition was shaped when America, as an idea to be communicated to history, was new and unspoiled (or so it seemed); but that now America is something else again, and what that older Southern autochthonous Left wanted has to be changed into something other than sectionalism, something more like de-colonization and separatism.

There must be tens of thousands of Southern whites who can be made to see that America is going down the historical drain, and that it is time for them to think in terms of their Ark. In any case, aside from the will to break away, this movement for Southern independence has its leftwing past; in a sense, cultivation of that past, recruitment of its descendents, will provide the weights that will keep this revolutionary balloon from floating off to the moon. As ideological resource, it would be the movement's Right.

What's left to be said, of course, is what the present resources are; what is there in the present trend of events (aside from discovering a tradition) that makes Southern separatism a communicable cause? I have some ideas on this, but I am going to keep them to myself until I hear, one way or another, from the "youth international" in the American South. While I am confident that I know where the Right will come from in a movement for Southern liberation, I am worried about its resources for a Left. I know what I hope for from the young in this regard, but for a change I'd like to hear them say it for themselves. -end-

SOUTHERN MYTHOLOGY POLITICS AND IDENTITY

--BY JODY PALMOUR--

Those who set the dominant interpretation of a people's history determine the bounds within which they can control their own lives. As someone working for an economically and politically democratic and decentralized society, I urge a reinterpretation of the Southern experience.

I wish to argue the question strategically with the clear assumption that our involvement in SSOC, SDS, etc. is not from a vague desire for "social change". We must want to do more than affect the way others are going to control society. We, or those who share our assumptions about democracy and the individual, must hope to dominate the development and allocation of society's resources and institutions. We must be confident about the ulitimate triumph of our vision of popular sovereignty and individual liberty. In that confidence of triumph we must search for a pattern of activities and symbols that will secure our objective. I consider the development of a radical Southern identity as a major strategic possibility for the American radical movement and that it is the responsibility of those of us in the South to develop such an identity.

We know from trying to organize people around specific problems that the solution to a problem must be in the interest of the person involved. More pointedly, the person must recognize the change to be beneficial for him before he will actively involve himself. We say, for example, that it's in the best interest of students to determine with faculty the material they will study together and the regulation of their common life on campus. Very few students, however, see their interests in this way, so few are involved in university insurgency. The others see students as expendable elements in the process of the university and know of no instances in which students have played creative roles in university planning.

Without a knowledge of university insurgency in the history of education, students have no terms with which to express or even consider their anxieties as legitimate community and political problems around which to organize themselves. (They have no terms unless they are capable of abstract or generalized thinking that relates their situation to those already struggling in other institutions.) Their problems, they are told, are personal ones and therefore private and not subject to community discussion and political solution. Students then don't get together, and at best one or two individuals encourage some mild campus reform that few people ever learn occurred.

THE FREEDOM MOVEMENT LESSON

Another example of the role one's view of his situation plays in determining his actions would be the Negro Freedom Movement. We see there that as long as people accept what others say about them, they will conform to these expectations. Call a man a smelly, lazy, old nigger and make it impossible for him to gain economic status comparable to your own and thereby independent of you, and he will quite probably become the very person you tell him he is already.

The Negro's history in America shows many instances of individual advancement prior to the Montgomery boycott and the Greensboro sit-ins. Individual Negroes have always competed successfully for jobs and a degree of social acceptance. But these successes were greatly the exception to the general experience. And although a better job was clearly in the interest of the man involved, his getting the job had at the least one major detrimental effect on the condition of the Negro people as a whole.

If Negroes and their white supporters became convinced that the Black man's freedom could be gained through programs stressing individual initiative and personal improvement, they quite effectively surrendered the possibility of their success. It is statistically impossible for all Negroes to have decent jobs and homes within the present structure of American society. It is simply impossible for everyone in this country to have initiative and self respect as these terms are commonly defined. The economy won't permit it.

Leaders in SNCC recognizing this fact read history differently. Instead of self improvement for individuals so they could apply for jobs that did not exist, their emphasis became the creation of political power to force society to create the jobs required.

They said in what was a wholly different reading of their situation: We've been lied to about our own history and the history of the country. The Western tradition is the record of a few whites dominating the world's colored peoples to exploit them. We did not sit back idly while you had us in iron chains and will not sit back now that those chains have been changed into economic and psychological ones.

Black Power was very consciously developed as a myth or interpretation of history to provide an orientation for racial (national) liberation. The very ability to act presupposes some orientation to external events. The political question is whether that orientation is an adequate response to reality given one's objectives or goals. SNCC saw that the dominant myth of the Negro's life in America had to be subverted. The old myth crippled all efforts at attaining SNCC's goal of democratic and political freedom for the Negro because the impediment to success was pictured as a personal problem of nonpreparedness for the general competition instead of a societal problem that could only be solved through united political action.

The new myth, or more properly, symbology, was a new history giving a robust flesh to the skeletal framework of Negro facts in America and Africa. Parts of that history weren't mentioned much before, like the slave revolts, and most of the well known is rewritten. Booker T. Washington remains a great man, but his individual self-improvement is not going to lead anybody to their freedom, and, SNCC adds, it never was.

Politically, SNCC has learned, the event is not so important as is its interpretation. The politically dominant are those who retain control of the interpretation of events, or better still, history as a whole.

An example is SNCC's attack on the military. Many Negroes see military service as better than staying on the block and maybe even as a good way to get in the good graces with the country, open a few doors, be honestly patriotic, etc. The military provides a release valve on the ghetto by permitting individuals a minimal degree of success and allowing steam to escape from what is essentially a pressure cooker. SNCC wants to close that valve. They define as Black Mercenaries those willing to kill for pay and status and explain that they're killing people struggling for their freedom from the very Man who's held them down. Kinda puts you in a bind if you have seen the Army as an out if the going gets much worse.

The theory is that tightening the valves in a ghetto enough to raise the pressure considerably, could produce the force to gain control of the ghetto and direct its development toward political, economic and personal freedom for those who live in it. The people would take over their own city.

> Quoted in Tom Watson, Agrarian Rebel by C. Vann Woodward, New York, 1963 pp. 334-35.

The process of gaining control is called de-colonization. SNCC is no longer a Negro organization but a Black, Afro-American one. It's part of a world-wide movement of national liberation throwing off the yoke of neo-imperialsim, fighting the same oppressor. SNCC victories here become victories for the Vietnamese, the South Africans, the Guatemalans, etc.

SNCC is attempting to develop an interpretation of the struggle of 20 million racially distinguisable Americans that would give it world-wide consequences for the freedom of all exploited men. They are doing this by defining the symbols with which people see themselves in radically political terms with a deep internationalist underpinning. (I refer of course to the fullest expressions of Black Power by the SNCC leadership and not to what Time magazine would have us believe they mean.) While their political meaning is internationalist, that meaning is couched in a phraseology uniquely relevant to the Black Community where SNCC works. There is no reason to expect SNCC to speak in terms relevant to the poor southern white because that's not where SNCC is at.

SNCC and COALITIONS

SNCC doesn't talk much about coalitions because there's no group of congruent insurgent symbology with whom to coalesce. Coalition with those who haven't expressed the deep desire for de-colonization would fracture the growing consciousness among Blacks that they are a colonized people. It's a case of the wrong allies being a more insidious enemy than one you've flushed out into the open.

Bad faith is often charged against the SNCC leadership--that they at least should be open to strategy sessions with other radicals. But perhaps one of the dynamics of national liberation movements is underscored here. White Americans are the simplest designation of the colonial power exploiting Black folk. If whites are to be other than morally concerned sympathizers with the underdog, i.e., unreliable bystanders when the struggle gets tough, they must be seen as building in the same direction, in terms with the same meaning, for the same ends, i.e., an overthrow of the dominant established institutions of exploitative society and the creation of a free society based on democratic self-interest revealed through the struggle. It is possible for SNCC to say then that the white radical leadership is in bad faith because they've not consciously begun the process of de-colonized thinking and strategizing. Bad faith is related to effective action just as much as to sincerety of motive.

(Two other decidedly important considerations about coalitions and organizational integrity are: 1)the structural immaturity of the American left that causes coalition to mean a vague sense of working together instead of coordinated strategy and tactics in jointly-defined local situations with integrated levels of administration in programming; and, 2)the latent racism in both white and Black groups that is exaccerbated by the vagueness of operation.)

It seems to me that all of us working to gain control of our society have to consider the strategic importance of what SNCC is trying to do with myth, symbol-making and the reinterpretation of the Black man's history in America. And if we agree to its importance, we must search for the ways in which their experience and that of the insurgent movements throughout the world can be related to our own work.

INSURGENCY & INTERNATIONALISM

I am now working in the South and plan to remain for the foreseeable future (at least until we win). The context of our work here is suggested by the experience of people we're working with and by the way they interpret their situation. I don't mean their interpretation of single, specific problems but rather their total, general sense of who they are socially and politically, not that the welfare worker is impolite and cold but that the whole society knows a life different from theirs and is out of reach.

I am searching for material with which to build a deeply insurgent understanding of living in the South. I'm not expecting to find a clearly formulated revolutionary symbology from what is at best a potentially revolutionary situation. I believe that C. Vann Woodward's work for example, especially the first and final essays in his The Burden of Southern History, points to greatly promising elements of the South's past that could be molded into an insurgent, internationalist, mythology.

THE UNDERDEVELOPED SOUTH

Vann Woodward maintains that the South is different from the rest of America because the South has experienced what the country as a whole has not. In his view, it is precisely this body of experience that can save America from its growing alienation from what is the reality of contemporary living for most of the world's people.

The South is much akin to an underdeveloped country. Southerners have known with their third world counterparts the flushed anger of living in wastelands of poverty dotted with islands of flagrant opulence. Sensitive Southerners have also known the provincialism and backwardness that has frustrated and numbed the desire to democratically develop so many other underdeveloped areas.

Extending Vann Woodward's analogy and making it even more politically relevant, the South also knows about national and international industries moving in, telling half truths as they come. We get the same line as does any other underdeveloped area. There are indeed going to be new jobs and opportunities, but with those jobs will come outside control of cities and counties, natural and human resources.

WHO CONTROLS?

The important consideration here is not that many elements of this alien presence will be more liberal than the present undemocratic local control. The fact is that the question of Who Controls? can be raised ever so much more easily when an outside presence is involved. And once an onslaught has been mounted against a structure controlled from the outside, attacks can be made against similar structures that are controlled locally but which work under the same alien principles.

By attacking a plant on specific issues of workers' rights and responsibilities, but doing so with terms pointing to alien control and stressing the principle of decolonization, one could prepare the way for local control and popular sovereignty. Our goal is local control--by the people involved. By relating the function of the corporate structure of top-down decision making to outside control, the energy we know we can exercise against Them Damn Yankees just might be turned against the corporate structure itself. To the chagrin of the AFL-CIO, workers might start talking about worker control again.

Phrasing the whole struggle for unionization or campus community government, etc. as an insurgent act against the basically neo-colonial power of the corporate-liberal establishment (but obviously not doing so in a wooden fashion) could accomplish two strategic objectives. First, it heavily underscores the basic difference in self interest between the established and the insurgent forces. This is an old problem in the South where the Black and white oppressed were both made to think their interest was the same as the man in the Big House. The difficulty of maintaining the conflict of interest is probably the dominant strategic consideration under the American system of corporate liberalism.

Continued

The second consideration is that insurgency against a common opponent breeds alliances and a consolidation of self interest against the established power. At a time when the social question is being raised more forcefully and threateningly on the international rather than the national level, we must be developing a powerful base of identification with the struggle (and not simply the humanity) of all working for de-colonization.

REINTERPRETING "THE WAR"

A radical, insurgent Southern Identity could well work in service to this end. As rightfully frightened as some might be of the idea of exploiting it, the South has been militarily, economically and politically dominated by what are organically the same forces interested in the perpetuation of the Vietnam War. To utilize this awesomely powerful fact for our radical ends, would require a reinterpretation of the Civil War.

Remembering the general premise of this piece to be that those who determine the dominant interpretation of history set the possibilities for action in the present, we can look at the popularized history of the Civil War to see who was effectively calling the shots then and how we might start calling them now.

It is quite broadly agreed among historians that in the years preceding the war the leaders of southern society made a burdensome decision. They agreed in effect to wage the coming conflict on the terms most advantageous to the North. They agreed that insofar as the Southern people were concerned, the basic point of dispute was the defense of slavery. The "Peculiar Institution" that had been so much attacked by Southerners at the start of the 19th century was, in the face of rising northern attacks, elevated to being the king pen of Southern society and culture. The white South closed its eyes and fought with dumb tragedy to its still bleeding exhaustion.

We know now that the United States government was not fighting to free the slaves and that the deciding issue in the conflice was who would control the development of the nation's economy. For the Southern white to see that the North has never been motivated to free the Negro except insofar as it was "good business" to do so, that the North used the slavery questions to inflame northern opinion against the South in preparation for war, that Southern leaders played the white off against the black to hold them both down and to fight the land-owners' war, for him to begin to recognize this as a truer interpretation of his past suggests a whole new understanding of alternatives for present action.

The Southern white has been unquestionably duped. And as political organizers we must overcome the disgust and/or fear we have for his frustrated actions and passions. He already knows that somebody on the outside is probably not working in his best interest. We can and must build on this primitive sense of colonization and develop it into a truly insurgent revolutionary consciousness that can identify with the world-wide freedom movement.

Lord knows the South's experience provides ample evidence of betrayal and exploitation. Our heritage is rich with lessons which we must learn. If in our own minds we can gain a sense of what the New South, growing out of that mangled, bitter/sweet past, might mean, I am confident we can build a movement to bring the South to life. The insurgent student movement must become the interpreter of Southern history.

END

ONE MAN'S SOLUTION

"Firmly convinced as I am that there can be no peace on our continent so long as the Southern people exist, I don't much care whether they are destroyed by emancipation, or in other words a vigorous system of guerilla war carried on by negroes on our side, or by the slower and more doubtful measures of choaking them with their own cotton."

THE SOUTHERN POTENTIAL

--by ED HAMLETT--

I shall recognize as tests of sectionalism all of those methods by which a given area resists national uniformity, whether by mere opposition in public opinion on the part of a considerable area, or by formal protest, or by combining its votes in Congress and in presidential elections, and also those manifestations of economic and social separateness involved in the existence in a given region of a set of fundamental assumptions, a mental and emotional attitude which segregates the section from other sections or from the nation as a whole. Sooner or later such sectional influences find expression in politics and legislation, and they are even potential bases for forcible resistance.

--Frederick Jackson Turner[1]

Announcing this issue of the NEW SOUTH STUDENT, I said that "Raising the banner of Southern Nationalism is both difficult and dangerous for one who advocates a New South." I am not proposing a "War Between the States for Southern Independence." On the other hand, I do advocate the development of a positive and stronger consciousness of the Southern region among the people of the South.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In its earliest public statement SSOC said that it was interested in creating a "new and democratic South for all the world to emulate, not ridicule." Why is it that the region was singled out, especially given the malaise in the nation as a whole? It is because those who framed that statement were Southerners. They, their friends, associates, relatives, and the rest of the nation saw them as Southerners. They were somehow different from other people in the country. L. Reissman points out:

> Constitutionally, of course, the South has been part of the nation except during the Civil War. In sociological and psychological terms, on the other hand, the South has long persisted in maintaining its identity separate from the nation. Consider, for example, that only the South, unlike any other region, has its own flag and its own anthem to serve the purposes of sectional patriotism. Consider also that only in the South would local police powers be used to challenge and resist federal police powers, presumably with the support of significant segments of the South's population. I will not go so far as to claim that these examples are signs of a distinct Southern nation, but at the very least, they do convey the strong and viable sectional loyalties that have gripped the region.[2]

STAR SPANGLED "DIXIE"

Throughout my high school days I heard the national anthem in the morning and "Dixie" each afternoon. I don't remember anyone ever questioning this policy. Cash say, "the peculiar history of the South has so greatly modified it from the general American norm that when viewed as a whole, it decisively justifies the notion that the country is--not quite a nation within a nation, but the next thing to it."[3] Allen Tate referred to the South as "Uncle Sam's other province."[4]

It is not only that the people of the South and many outside it view the region as being different; many natives see it as somehow special, and better.

COLUMBIA'S ARROGANCE

One of the greatest problems that the United States faces is what a Southerner from Arkansas calls "the arrogance of power." Further, the powerful master simply cannot identify with the vast majority of the world's people. If they are to advance economically it is with the crumbs that fall from Columbia's bounteous table after she has eaten her fill; she has no notion of what those crumbs taste like or of how difficult they are to gather and swallow. Perhaps the saddest thing is that most of the people in the U.S. don't give a damn.

THE SOUTH--EMPATHY OR APATHY

I believe (or perhaps I would like to believe), in contrast, that the people of the South have within them the potential for empathy; furthermore, I believe the potential to be qualitatively different from that of any other section.

Since the Civil War, the South has been at the mercy of the North for its sustenance and growth. The resources, human and natural, have been exploited by outside capital--some foreign and the rest northern. Even today, our petty politicians go begging in the North for an industry, construct a building for it with our tax money, allow it to be used tax-free for years, and conspire with management to keep labor from organizing--all this, and our workers bring home $1.50 per hour or less. This helps the South about as much as it does the workers in the North who lost their jobs when the plant "escaped" to Dixie. The money thus "saved" goes into the pockets of the absentee stockholders; the northern workers are out of a job; and we down here get the crumbs.

But lest we despair, alternatives are being sought by the boys downtown; at the last meeting of the Southern Governors Conference, the primary topic of discussion was the promotion of tourism.

A DIFFERENT VIEW?

If people view themselves as being different, then the chances of their behaving differently are enhanced. If Vann Woodward[5] and others who point out that our history has equipped us in special ways are right, then our ability to empathize with the people of the world is increased. In addition, our ability grows in inverse proportion to the extent to which we identify with the goals, policies, and actions of the national political, military, and financial establishments.

I view the South as an underdeveloped area. In an article on the financial page of the Atlanta Constitution entitled "South Cannot Overtake U. S. Per Capita Income," Jim Montgomery had this to say: "...Georgia's projected 1966 per capita personal income of $2,345 winds up some $590 below the projected national average of $2,935. In 1965, Georgia trailed by $587; since 1960, Georgia has not trailed by less than $575; and the state hasn't trailed the nation by less than $500 in 14 years. Put another way, the gap between Georgia and the national average has widened from $462 in 1948 to nearly $600 now. The entire South is in the same fix." (my emphasis).

One hundred years of varying policies within the South by the North, including the federal government, has not brought the South into parity with the nation. In fact, our relative position, as is the case with the underdeveloped world, is getting worse. There are no prospects for a change in the situation in the forseeable future.

A SOUTHERN ALTERNATIVE

Democratic forces within the region must move forthrightly for a Southern alternative--that is, we must begin now to define new policies for development for ourselves. Southerners must begin to act toward the South in a responsible and self-conscious manner. States' rights must be emphasized responsibly. In short, we must make our own cultural, social, political, and economic revolution, taking control of state and local governments in our region. -continued

THINK SOUTHERN

Since financial resources are in short supply, then ways must be devised at the state level of obtaining new sources of revenue. For instance, corporations that exploit the South for the benefit of "foreign" stockholders must be "persuaded" to leave a far greater portion of profits in the South either through increased wages, increased investment, or simply as taxes.

A NEW MISSION

But of course much more than money is needed. If a viable alternative is to be implemented, the people of the South must work, and work hard, for it. The people must be imbued with a new sense of mission. Mission is certainly not a term that is unknown in the region, but it must be construed to apply to the domestic front. People can perform veritable miracles if they truly believe in a cause. It would seem that programs for their own benefit would be a cause about which they might be convinced and excited. Many people have made much over self-interest and economic issues as rallying points; on the contrary, it is my opinion that moral questions should be emphasized. Finally, increased identification with the "Third World" must be encouraged.

TOWARD SPIRITUAL SECESSION

I am a seccesionist--I urge moral and spiritual secession. One of our goals must be the development, by example, of an alternative for the northern and western U.S. to emulate. Contact with decent elements outside the South must always be maintained. (Who knows, S. Dakota might one day join us.) Further, we must continue to > Tell about the South. What's it like there. What do they do there. Why do they live there. Why do they live at all?

> You can't understand it. You would have to be born there.
> William Faulkner
> Absalom, Absalom!

And even if you were Southern-born, there is no assurance that you would understand. For generations Southerners have claimed a distinctiveness for their region and for themselves, but they have continually disagreed about the substance and nature of that distinctiveness. For outside observers--foreigners--, the South and its people have remained mysteries, curious enigmas. In the words of David Potter, a native son, "...the South has been a kind of Sphinx on the American land." In the attempt to understand the Southern Sphinx both Southerners and outsiders have devoted much time and effort in explanations of Southern distinctiveness.

The theme of Southern distinctiveness has been one of the most pervasive and enduring features of both popular and academic mythology. But Southern separatism is also a reality; for instance, there eexist innumerable organisations entitled "The Southern.. ." this-or-that, among them the Southern Student Organizing Committee. Why the distinctiveness, the separatism? We all know of the growth of white pro-slavery support, indeed a religion, from 1820 to 1860. We all know of the futile battles fought to preserve a hopelessly immoral institution. We all know of the myths of Reconstruction--the white myth of a horrible era, the black myth of a golden age. And we all know of the separate South as the land of racism, rampant Negrophobia, bloody violence, disease, poverty, a sex-crazed, Bible worshipping populace, the Sahara of the Bozart. We all have had our fill of Vardamans, Bilbos, Heflins, Talmadges, Byrds, Wallaces, Sheltons, et al. So why now Southern Nationalism?

I believe the unfurling of the banner of Southern Nationalism is an impulse that comes from the very depths of the Southern soul, from the intense and profound feelings for the rootedness of a society, no matter how much corrupted and still corrupt, which possesses certain values of deep meaning to human beings. Those certain values establish for the Southerner a vantage point from which he can, and often does, criticise the utter sickness and hypocrisy of the dominant American society.[1] But it is not only as a tool for the critique of American society that the Southerner revels in his distinctiveness. It is also that he conceives his values and his vision of society to be so remote from the attainment of the Yankee and so dear to him, so that separatism becomes the only method for realising his values and his society. And, although he is aware of the grandeur intrinsic in his isolation and stubborn individuality, he is troubled by the ironic loss of individuality inherent in a species of nationalism. Nevertheless, to the question, "Can we fight again, but for those 'peculiar virtues' that are vague yet real in our souls?" the Southern Nationalist answers in the affirmative.

Man must invent his future if his future is to have any meaning. Although this declaration increasingly is accepted by those who study the impact of new technologies upon man, our society directs minimal effort toward this goal. Most of our study, planning, and actions continue to be based on the assumption that the future will resemble the past.

"A WHITE MAN'S COUNTRY"

There have been many explanations for the phenomenon of Southern distinctiveness, explanations which sought to explore the enigma of Southerness. A number of the insights provided by these explanations are relevant to Southern Nationalism and therefore ought to be examined. An appropriate starting place is the well-known essay, "The Central Theme of Southern History" by Ulrich Bonnell Phillips.[2] Phillips' thesis was that the dominant theme of Southern history has been the common resolve of the white people, "Whether expressed with the frenzy of a demagogue or maintained with a patrician's quietude," to maintain the South forever as "a white man's country." Phillips explicitly ruled out as central themes agrarianism, religion, states' rights, slavery, the Democratic Party, and one-crop agriculture. None of these were adequate explanations for the essence of Southernism. To support his thesis, Phillips presented considerable evidence of the opinions of white people during the secession crisis. This evidence, he asserted, showed that all levels of white society--rich and poor--were resolved to defend slavery not only "as a system of racial adjustment and social order," but also "as a guarantee of white supremacy and civilization." He even claimed "that sundry free negroes gave warm endorsement to the project of Southern independence." Although concentrating largely on the secession crisis, Phillips concluded his essay with a brief sketch outlining the continuance of the white people's resolve to maintain white supremacy during the Reconstruction era, the Populist insurgency, and the first decades of the twentieth century.

THE LIBERAL AGRARIANS

In these days of the backlash, when we are witnessing the death throes of the Civil Rights Movement, we are inclined to admit without question the validity of Phillips' thesis. White people still have almost all of the power in the South; and they are still resolved, though perhaps with not as much frothy fervour as in the past, to maintain white supremacy. And at present we are inclined to view the history of the South, at least since 1820, as having revolved about the racist desire for white domination. Yet it is a curious phenomenon that twentieth century Southern liberals very often neglected or avoided Phillips' thesis. One obvious reason for the avoidance was that they wished to shun identification with Phillips who essentially favoured white supremacy, albeit expressed with the "patrician's quietude."

Another reason, perhaps more basic, was that agrarianism held a greater attraction for liberals than did white supremacy. Liberals were attracted by the agrarian theme because, unlike white supremacy, agrariansim affirmed that there was something of value in the Southern tradition. Agrarianism was identified with Jeffersonian democracy, which so obviously was a Good Thing. The South thus became the progenitor of democracy, Jeffersonianism, American egalitarianism, etc.

As David Potter pointed out, agrarianism had yet another function: it posed an alternative in the twentieth century to the predominately industrial American way of life. Most importantly, it posed an alternative that was not Marxist. The dissatisfied liberals could maintain their respectability as "responsible" dissenters, since a non-Marxist Agrarianism was within the American tradition.

TWELVE SOUTHERNERS

Yet the best known literary creation of Southern Agrarianism was not, for the most part, written by liberals. In fact, to most of the twelve authors of I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition, their manifesto was written to oppose the tenets of liberal progressivism. Indeed, Robert Penn Warren wished to entitle it Tracts Against Communism. In general, the twelve Southerners voiced a protest against the dominant values of liberal, industrial, progressive America; in its stead, they proposed that the nation, or at least the South, adopt values which they identified as those of an agrarian society. Although their conceptions of "economics" have been justifiedly criticised, they were not so much interested in the economic basis of society as in the spiritual. They saw American people in the business "civilization" of the twenties engaging in a frantic struggle for material possessions, being spurred on by "the gospel of Progress." And they asked, Why? Toward what end was all this struggle devoted? They asserted that the industrial system was brutalising, fragmenting and despiritualising man. Progress and Industrialism were causing man to lose his contact with nature, were stifling man's creative, aesthetic, and religious impulses, and were thus dehumanising him. In the place of Industrialism, they advocated the agrarian community--a community where man communed with nature, where man felt a sense of rootedness to the past, where man existed serenely and harmoniously, and where man was aware of his own finiteness and of the infinity of nature.

The twelve Southerners observed that the South was beginning to hanker after the false ideals of Progress and Industrialism, against which they cried out so earnestly. John Crowe Ransom, in the book's first essay, "Reconstructed But Unregenerate," declared that the central "question at issue is whether the South will permit herself to be so industrialised as to lose entirely her historic identity, and to remove the last substantial barrier that has stood in the way of American progressivism; or will accept industrialism, but with a very bad grace, and will manage to maintain a good deal of her traditional philosophy." Ransom implicitly recognised that the industrialisation of the South was a fact; but he denied that the industrial values must necessarily supplant the historic values of the agrarian South, if the South would maintain a determination to retain its values. To prevent the dehumanisation of men, the South must be so resolved, for, said Ransom, "A man can contemplate and explore, respect and love, an object as substantial as a farm or a native province. But he cannot contemplate nor explore, respect nor love, a mere turnover, such as an assemblage of 'natural resources," a pile of money, a volume of produce, a market, or a credit system."

It has often been pointed our that the champions of agrarianism, whether liberal or conservative, have not sufficiently recognised the limits of their thesis with regard to the South. As David Potter wrote, agrarianism "envisioned a subsistence economy, agricultural diversification, a wide distribution of small landholdings, a large class of independent husbandmen, and an unstratified society. The cold fact is that none of these features has ever been dominant in the South." The importance of the manifesto of the twelve Southerners for a present-day Southern Nationalism, however, does not reside in how accurately they portrayed the Southern society of the past. Its importance, rather, rests in the validity and relevance of the values which they thought necessary for the establishment and maintenance of a humane society in the South. They sought to draw such values from the Southern past and from Southern tradition.

AND VANN WOODWARD

In this modern age of alienation and anomie, what relevant values can be drawn from the Southern past and traditions? C. Vann Woodward, in a remarkable and pioneering essay, "The Search for Southern Identity,"[3] provided an answer to that question. Southern distinctiveness, said Woodward, rested in the history of the South, "the collective experience of the Southern people." That collective experience had distinguished the South from the rest of America in four ways. America has been conspicuous in its economic abudnance; "but the history of the South includes a long and quite un-American experience with poverty." Success and victory have for long been a part of the American way of life; but the South has known "large components of frustration, failure, and defeat." American opulence and success have combined to nourish the peculiarly American legend of innocence and virtue (witness the liberals' holy war in Vietnam); but the South, living with the moral and social evils of slavery and segregation, has been preoccupied with guilt. Lastly, mobile Americans are characterised by abstraction, by a relation to everybody, everywhere, and always; Southerners, on the contrary, have a fear of abstraction, and feel themselves related to the concrete, to place, locality, community. Elsewhere, Woodward remarked that these four distinguishing characteristics of the Southern collective experience were much closer to "the common experience of the rest of mankind" than the American experience.

To explain Southern distinctiveness David Potter, in his essay "The Enigma of the South,"[4] suggested the concept of the folk culture which the South possessed "long after it succumbed to the onslaught of the urban-industrial culture elsewhere. It was an aspect of this culture that the relation between the land and the people remained more direct and more primal in the South than in other parts of the country. . . . Even in the most exploitative economic situations, this culture retained a personalism in the relations of man to man which the industrial culture lacks." Yet, it should be noted, this explanation like the others focuses on the past. What of the future?

FOUR TRENDS (MINUS ONE)

If a mythology of Southern Nationalism--an interpretive myth to explain our human and Southern existence--is to be created and formulated, it must obviously be built upon some of the roots of the Southern past. Yet it must also absorb and give meaning to the changes accompanying the future. To fathom the future is, of course, a rather tricky task at best. Nonetheless, there are a few current trends which appear to contain some significance for the future. One such trend is the increasing sophistication of modern technology. The industrial basis of society is being rapidly transformed by automation and cybernation. Another trend is the growth of an articulate, positive race consciousness on the part of black Americans. The goals of black consciousness, however, have yet to be formulated clearly. A third trend is the increasing extent of the controuls exercised by the minions of the American military-industrial complex upon the resources, governments, and peoples of the world. The increasing controuls of this complex result in a growing powerlessness on the part of the affected peoples, who consequently are frustrated in the attainment of desires not in accordance with the aims of the American military-industrial complex. And lastly, the trend of increasing urbanisation in the South appears to be a consequence of the increasing industrial development of the region.

THREE TRENDS + HISTORY = DIFFERENCE?

It has often been assumed that, with the exception of black consciousness,[5] these trends would tend to make the South indistinguishable from the rest of the country. In fact, some commentators have proclaimed that as an accomplished deed. There is, of course, some validity to the claim; the South has been changing in some ways similar to the changes which occurred earlier in the North. Yet I think the claim is overstated. The plan facts are, as Woodward pointed out, that the history of the South has been different from that of the nation; and that the Southern people regard their history in a fashion different from that of the American people. The burden of their history still rests upon the backs of the Southern people, and it inevitably affects the ways in which they act upon their environment. Thus the subjective judgements which the Southern people make upon the many objective changes in their society--changes which appear to be similar to earlier changes in Northern society--will often vary from the judgements made by non-Southerners. The consequent variances have ensured and, most likely, will continue to ensure a Southern distinctiveness.

SOME PARTIAL ANSWERS

Given the continuing phenomenon of Southern distinctiveness, the crucial question for Southern Nationalism with regard to the future is: How will Southern Nationalism[6] relate to or deal with the four large trends discussed above? In partial answer, I wish to suggest briefly and tenatively a few ideas, which may serve to outline how aspects of the Southern past may be fitted into the future.

Cybernation and the new technology make possible, ie economically feasible, the decentralisation of the economic basis of American society. If both political power and socio-economic power were decentralised, then the peoples of the world should be enabled to seize the powers and controuls presently exercised by the military-industrial complex. They would recover the possibilities of building societies based upon their own culture and history. By decentralisation, I do not mean that old liberal bugaboo of states' rights. Rather, I think that the loci of power should be in communities--all possessing equivalent amounts of power--whose limits would be defined by the people living within, so long as the rights of communities without were not offended.

With the legacy of white supremacy (see Phillips) and the growth of a positive black consciousness, there would probably be very few bi-racial communities in a decentralised society.

The new technology also makes possible the physical decentralisation of cities. Potter's conception of a folk culture in the South probably would continue to have meaning and relevance to a South once more physically decentralised. The Agrarians' natural, non-industrial values would have increased validity in a physically decentralised society with a cybernetic socio-economy that would be qualitatively different from the urban-industrial culture.

ROOTEDNESS or ALIENATION

The special rootedness of Southern society would likely be strengthened in communities based upon those naturual, non-industrial values. And these new, yet old, communities would help to preserve that peculiar historical consciousness of Southerners, whose experiences, as Woodward noted, have been similar to the common lot of mankind. Hopefully, a renewal of their collective historical experience will enable Southerners to be possessed of a sense of the frailty of the human species--a sense of frailty that impels the realisation that their historic roots can be the basis of a humane society in this age of alienation and anomie.

5. I except black consciousness because it has been so little discussed in the past.
6. It will be seen from the discussion below, that my advocacy of decentralisation on a community basis makes the term "Southern Nationalism" a misnomer. Nevertheless, for want of a better term, I continue to use it. Also it will be seen that the "loss of individuality inherent in a species of nationalism" is not so much a problem when the "nationalism" is decentralised.

A NOTE ABOUT THE ARTICLES THAT FOLLOW BY J. STRICKLAND AND J.M. DABBS:

The editors contacted John Strickland and James McBride Dabbs about the possibility of their responding to the questions of Southern virtue, "Southernness" and Southern Nationalism. In a letter to Mr. Dabbs we asked if he thought the South should be "striving to catch up with the nation in all respects." We also wondered if there were not "things in the South which we are proud of and wish to preserve." John was asked to speak specifically to the question of "Southern virtue." The replies to these requests were contained in letters to one of the editors. They follow on pages 22 (Strickland) and 25 (Dabbs).

TOWARD THE MEANING OF OUR VIRTUE

--BY JOHN STRICKLAND--

(I have tried to write the article I promised but it has come out in a form which is not as clear as journalistic prose. But in many more important ways it seems to me much clearer. So I am writing it more or less as it came to me.)

...One begins to suspect Fate when coincidence is so strong. I just looked up for a moment to think about my next line and my eyes rested on a book title opposite my writing table: The South As It Is--1865-66. I won't bother to open it. The title fits the thought I have: the South as an entity, a unity of men in thought and action, really existed only once--during the Civil War (or as my "Georgia History" teacher would have it, The War Between the States). The South as a mythic unity owes its existence to that troubled period. There have only been echoes since that time. If you wish to begin with myth, you have no choice but to begin there. For, insofar as you appeal to the "South," you appeal to dusty memories as well. I cannot see how we escape that. Only an intransigent faith in the principles of "modernity," of political economy or political sociology, can keep a man blind to the burden of the past. But what shall we do with the dream of nationalism which died so feebly and ignominiously in 1865? Rather than dying a noble death, this dream lives on, a stupendous joke, a gray-uniformed soldier mimicing the act of dying for over a hundred years. And what is even more a joke, some still rally to his side waving mass-produced replicas of the Confederate battle flag, hoping vainly or cynically that the old soldier will stop his heart-rending mime and lend honor to their path of bigotry and pusillanimity.

From Ode To the Confederate Dead

> ...Shall we take the act
> To the grave? Shall we, more hopeful, set up the > grave
> In the house? The ravenous grave?
> Leave now
> The shut gate and the decomposing wall:
> The gentle serpent, green in the mulberry bush,
> Riots with his tongue through the hush--
> Sentinel of the grave who counts us all!

To pursue the "myth of the South," I know no better way than to look at Cass Mastern, one of the characters in Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men. In my reading of the book, Cass represents the past honor of the South. I won't describe his quest in detail--it's much better when read--but I will attempt a summary by saying that his life represents all that is good in the South. He joined the Confederate Army to get himself killed, to try to relieve himself of the tremendous burden of guilt which his sense of justice imposed. All the moral conflicts imbedded in the "South" drove him to self-destruction. He constantly questioned himself and the South, as in this excerpt from a letter:

> ...I reflected that Mr. (Jefferson) Davis was a good man. But the world is full of good men, I now reflect as I write these lines down, and yet the world drives hard into darkness and blindness of blood, even as now late at night I sit in this hotel room in Vicksburg, and I am moved to ask the meaning of our virtue. May God hear our prayer!

It is difficult to read this without a tremor of recognition, for it reflects the constant self-agonizing search that is the birthright of every man conceived in the guilt-ridden atmosphere of the South. The narrator describes this beautifully in the novel when he talks about Cass:

> ...Cass Mastern lived for a few years and in that time he learned that the world is like an enormous spider web and if you touch it, however lightly, at any point, the vibration ripples to the remotest perimeter and the drowsy spider feels the tingle and is drowsy no more but springs out to fling the gossamer coils about you who have touched the web and then inject the black, numbing poison under your hide. It does not matter whether or not you meant to brush the web of things. Your happy foot or your gay wing may have brushed it ever so lightly, but what happens always happens and there is the spider, bearded black and with his great faceted eyes glittering like mirrors in the sun, or like God's eye, and the fangs dripping.

This passage is one of the most powerful images of Fate I know. It overwhelms, in my opinion, the conclusion reached in the book in which the paralysis which this insight brings is rejected. The last sentence contains the thoughts of a mind set to negate what seems now the illusion of Fate:

> ...soon now we shall go out of the house and go into the convulsion of the world, out of history into history and the awful responsibility of Time.

I am not unsympathetic to this ethic but it is one which I feel I cannot honestly recognize in myself. It is related in my mind to what I imagine to be the brief period of consciousness Sisyphus experiences at the bottom of the hill--just before pushing the rock up again. Perhaps that's how the "issue of the South" must be seen--in light of the Myth of Sisyphus. Condemned forever to push a rock up a hill only to have it roll down again so it is necessary to push it up again: perhaps this is the plight of the Southerner who would heed conscience.

However, I believe that Penn Warren holds a somewhat more romantic view than is expressed in the ethic of Camus. Partly, I am influenced by a poem written twenty-two years before All The King's Men appeared.

TO A ROMANTIC
(1924)
To Robert Penn Warren

You hold your eager head
Too high in the air, you walk
As if the sleepy dead
Had never fallen to drowse
From the sublimest talk
Of many a vehement house.
Your head so turned turns eyes
Into the vagrant West;
Fixing an iron mood
In an Ozymandias' breast
And because your clamorous blood
Beats an impermanent rest
You think the dead arise
Westward and fabulous:
The dead are those whose lies
Were doors to a narrow house.

I think the relevance of the statement to Penn Warren's philosophy may be dated; but I also think, dated or not, it bears great relevance to the spirit expressed in my own reflections against the spirit expressed in the last line of All the King's Men. I am drawn to the harsher view which I understand to be expressed in Tate's poetry; although I wish for more than the harsh vision--I also confess "clamorous blood"--I don't believe in "movements." They have become for me the "false light," the IGNIS FATUUS:

...
To the green tissue of the subterranean
Worm I have come back, two handed from
The chase, and empty. I have pondered it Carefully, and asked: Where is the light
When the pidgeon moults his ease
Or exile utters the creed of memory?

I take great liberties with this poem. I freely interpret "When the pidgeon moults his ease" with the election of Lurleen Wallace and Lester Maddox and all that may be associated with that pair of phenomena. And I also identify this letter--or attempt at a letter--with what happens to an "exile" who attempts to "utter the creed of memory." But I am reminded that I never did believe in "movements." My commitment to act was never from within that faith. More fundamental is a faith of a deeper and more inarticulate sort.

In short, Ed, I have lost the faith I never had. But to say that is only to say something about where I've been--not where I'm going or what I will do. I hope my letter is not interpreted as a negative act or as a refusal to act. I mean it to be a preparation for acting wisely. I'm sorry for so many "poses" (or quotations); it was the only way I could express what I felt with ease. It just came out that way. Perhaps now I've unburdened myself, I can begin to work toward understanding "the meaning of our virtue."

Yours in faith, John

ON OUR VIRTUE

A LETTER FROM JAMES McBRIDE DABBS

Dear Ed:* December, 1966

In regard to Southern Nationalism, I like the idea your're trying to develop but not the phrase. The South tried to become a nation in 1861; I'm glad it failed. It's not going to try again; the ties that bind us all together in the U.S. are far stronger than they were then, but reactionary Southerners still mouth the old words. To think of Southern Nationalism is to set up an idea opposed to American nationalism. I'm perfectly willing to move toward internationalism, but not backward to a regional nationalism. I've always been satisfied with the term regionalism; but there may be something in your mind that regionalism doesn't cover.

I imagine that you and I are pretty close to agreement that the South has something valuable to preserve, something which it shouldn't lose as it becomes increasingly a part of the nation. We probably differ somewhat on what this is and on how to cherish it.

TO UNDERSTAND AND CHERISH THE GOOD

Leave for the moment what it is. As of now, SSOC's approach seems to be primarily to root out the evils. This has to be done. But my main interest is in realizing and cherishing the good. To some degree--not entirely, of course--evil will disappear as good is cherished. Why did I join SSOC? Partly because I was ashamed of receiving all that mimeographed stuff and not helping pay for it! No, I was interested in SSOC from the beginning. Here, I thought, is movement that will involve white college students, maybe whites and Negroes together; SNCC had of course included whites, but relatively few. I assumed the predominately white group would be more conservative, mainly because it had suffered fewer injustices. It might therefore be relatively more concerned to understand the whole problem.

I'm an activist, but most indirectly. I find myself continually asking of a proposed idea, will it work? But I am willing to take a long time understanding the roots and relationships of an idea, in the belief that the better we understand, the better our chances of making it work.

I have always felt that poor education and lack of understanding were fundamental to our problem. I began The Southern Heritage with the words: "Like the rest of the South, I am confused." I have said again and again that we need students, students who really wanted to understand and who were now far enough removed from the old South to think without too much prejudice. So that I have been sympathetic to SSOC from the beginning. (I have also been sympathetic to SNCC, but I felt it easier to identify with SSOC.) continued, p.26

ON INDUSTRIALIZATION

One of the greatest faults of the South today is its defensiveness. This probably goes for white and Negro Southerners. The white South, of course, has defended the wrong things--impossible things--and is always being defeated. This makes some people more stubborn. It should make thoughtful people more intelligent, more determined to discover what within the South is worth defending. For the most part, this doesn't need defending, since few people are attacking it directly. But the modern, industrial world, well represented by the rest of the nation, is eating it away. Industrialism eats away our virtues indirectly by eating away the solid person who is their core. I doubt if industrialism is particularly dangerous to Southern life. It is dangerous to human life by its tendency to reduce the solid human being to an abstraction, to depersonalize him. In a machine economy, the person tends to become a function of the machine. Only that part of a man useful for production is developed; the rest is neglected. The solid man becomes an abstraction, a shadow. He becomes a "hand". But the whole Southern economy has been based upon "hands", you say. I know it, and I don't defend it. I happen to think that the loose Southern system had more loopholes for human development than the tight modern industrial system, but I'm certainly not defending the old system. Indeed, I want to see industry come in; I want a modern industry in our own community. I'm only saying "Be careful". It will surely bring a higher standard of living, but all that glitters is not gold. We shall have to humanize industry, or die of boredom.

ON THE VIRTUES OF THE "SOLID PERSON"

But what are these virtues of this "solid person"? Who is this Southerner? Begin with Vann Woodward's statement[1] that the South is the only section of the nation that has been defeated in a great war, suffered long-continued poverty, and feels a general sense of guilt. (Note also Robert Coles' interpretation that the Southerner is the only American who feels a sense of shame.[2]) What has all this taught us? Not enough, but something. A certain humility--in spite of vaunted Southern pride, mainly pride of person--a certain humility before life, a certain tentativeness, sometimes deeply hidden by aggression, a pervasive sense of humor, both to protect us from too great pain, and to indicate our feeling that life is never what it seems, a tentative, undeveloped sense of the tragic quality of life, a sense of compassion for man's hard and confused lot, a sense of our implication with others--even whites and Negroes together (we fight partly because we're such close kin), an attempt to soften the blows of life--and also to hide our own inner crookedness--by words, gestures, all that we mean by manners. Of all Americans, we are the most complex, the most lovable and damnable, the most human. This is one reason why we're still religious--I don't necessarily say Christian. If the solid person is eaten away, then you cannot have true humility, or compassion, or humor, or a sense of tragedy, or real involvement with others. You might have some manners left, but they'd be pretty shoddy.

The only way that all of this can be saved--if it can be--is through understanding and appreciation. I rarely ever feel defensive about the South, even when speaking in the North. I am too sure of these excellences which are deeply built into our natures. I've never decided, like you, to stay in the South; I've just stayed. Now you could hardly pry me out.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCH AND RADICAL STUDENTS

--BY J. ANDREW LIPSCOMB--

No one can doubt that innumerable documentations exist about the intricate interweaving of Southern culture and Southern religion. The South--one of the last existing strongholds of a classical example of "Christendom"--has had as its major pillar the forces of the Church. The Southern white church, perhaps more than any other institution in the South, has served as the conservator of the "Southern Way of Life"--even helped to create it. Excluding the involvement of the Negro churches in the Freedom Movement, the Church in the South cannot even be considered a neutral factor in the struggle for justice, but in almost every case is seen as a belligerent force to contend with. In the name of the Church and in the name of Christ atrocities have been committed and then secretly applauded, if not openly condoned, on the part of vast majorities of the Church members across the South.

And yet some strange facts point out a paradox. One of the places in which white youth in Southern culture, for example, can come into contact with concepts of social justice is in the camping programs of some of the churches. In many cases with the white student who has been "awakened," the roots of their awareness and actions lie in these youthful contacts with some of the men of integrity in the churches. And when these teenagers arrive on campuses in the South, the natural place for them to gravitate is toward the campus religious centers. This perhaps explains the fact that many campus travelers for radical or liberal groups make initial contacts easiest among the constituency of the local Wesley Foundation, Newman Center, or Westminster Fellowship.

Almost inevitably one is apt to find among student religionists (even among ministerial students?) a person or persons who is amenable to dialogue and/or action about the wide range of interests among the left-of-center concerns. Why is this? Why is it that a Wesley Center or Baptist Student Union which gains support from countless Rocky Mount Methodist Churches or Mount Moriah Baptist Churches across the Black Belt--how can it be that these groups serve as one of the very few places on Southern white campuses where dialogue and action can occur on civil rights, peace, and university reform? Over and over again an ever so tiny dribble of radicals and revolutionaries wander onto campuses from Vacation Church Schools into picket lines and teach-ins--honestly believing that stuff about thou shalt not kill and love thy brother. What is it that has led these individuals from a small Methodist church in the hills of East Tennessee or a Baptist church in the hot pine forests of the Bible Belt or even a Church of Christ in a small town on Sand Mountain in North Alabama into the Movement? What is it that has led them to a common understanding of the injustice of the Southern Way of Life, to a common guilt, a common confession, and a common commitment to what must be done?

Quite simply to me (I'm sure a sociologist might be able to give a more "scientific" answer), it is satisfactory to say that they have been converted. Indeed, this is actually what has taken place. Most of "us" religionists still have families where nothing more serious than the weather can be discussed. We have been converted from the racist background of our parents, friends and neighbors. How has this conversion come about?

Leadership is the key factor in understanding this phenomenon. And I refer here to ecclesiastical leadership. With the possible exception of an infrequent school teacher, a minute group of clergy has been the one element in a major institution of Southern society in which there has been a continuous involvement in social justice and righteousness.

For example, Andrew Sledd is a name held sacred among Methodist clergymen in South Alabama. Few of these men who revere that name ever knew him--but that is unimportant. Dr. Sledd was a minister around the turn of the century in South Alabama and a professor at Emory. In 1902, while at Emory, he published an article in the Atlantic Monthly in which he attacked Jim Crow law as incompatible with fundamental human rights. For that, he was immediately dismissed at Emory. He later became president of Florida University; before he died he returned to the Emory faculty.

Andrew Sledd has come to represent for many men what the Christian faith in actuality is, has come to represent a tiny thread of integrity and prophetic witness in the burlap of Southern ecclesiastical history.

During the Selma march, little was heard of involvement of clergymen and church leaders in Alabama. By and large a mass condemnation is deservedly heaped on this segment because there was little if any involvement except that of reaction and reflex. Yet men were crucified and no reports appeared in the Washington Post or the New York Times. About the only public notice given was a small inconspicuous note in the organizational poop sheets that Reverend Good had been transferred to another pulpit in another conference; that Reverend Allbright had decided to return to seminary; and that Reverend Young had been forced to retire for his health. Some lost the "right" to a pulpit altogether. Granted that this happened only very infrequently.

But these are the very men who have influenced those of us who find ourselves on the side of social justice. These are the men who got hold of us in our "home" church or at Camp Sumatagga and told us what the Faith was really about. In spite of the abominable lack of involvement of the Southern white churches in the fight against the denial of human rights (or more simply stated, in the world itself), there remains even after Selma and Bogalusa that thread of commitment which runs from the local church on the edge of town to the small centers of the Movement on red brick campuses across the South.

There is really no greater figure to pity today than the white Southern clergyman in a parish ministry. But pity is something that he doesn't need. In very few places have religious leaders of integrity had to tread the line more carefully than in the South in order to maintain even their residency in the region. In few places outside the South have the religious communities been more apt to render a clergyman a pariah if he speaks out. (It is with some sadistic satisfaction that these clergymen are seeing northern ministers now beginning to come under fire in recent years for what they have experienced for decades.) But be that as it may, this pressure cannot be an excuse for the leadership which the white clergy as a whole has failed to supply. Taken as a whole, the ministerial ranks of the churches are racist, reactionary, anachronistic, and even demonic as is the culture which it generates, reflects and supports.

Having written the title of this article, perhaps I should have stopped there. If I have degenerated into an analysis of the white ministerial martyr, when I should have been talking about radical-religious students, it is because there's not much to be said about the latter. -END-

We in the South come to industrialization late. We know, therefore, the dangers: depersonalization and abstraction. We have behind us a life, for all its vices, concrete, full-bodied, rich. We should be careful not to exhange this for shadowy modern man. I don't know what to do. I simply say, keep your eyes open on what we are and on what we may become. I'm not in favor of a nationalist movement in the South. I am in favor of a Southern movement. With all of our mouthing about the South, we don't love it enough. Certainly not intelligently enough. We need "a better mind in our hearts," as my four-year-old daughter once prayed.

Sincerely,

James McBride Dabbs _____ Mayesville, South Carolina

TO LIVE AND DIE IN DIXIE

by John Beecher

A REVIEW: by BOB BAILEY

There are poets who are radical, and there is some radical poetry, but the latter stands in poor proportion to the former. Politics is not supposed to be the stuff of poetry. Robert Lowell speaks at a teach-in and refuses an invitation to a White House dinner, but his poetry shies from the nitty gritty (an unpoetic word.) The New Left, if that is what we are, has produced very little radical poetry from its experience. This particular sterility, in the long run, is probably to our credit. The political bag is an impossible place to write poetry from, but this is no time for anyone to get out of that bag. The bright exceptions are the poems by Jane Stembridge and those by Todd Gitlin in the latest issues of Liberation.

John Beecher is a radical poet. Although he says he is a poet first, I think I could disagree and call him a radical first without deprecating his poetry. He is not of the New Left, but he is generally with it; which is to say, he has not undergone the usual depressing metamorphosis from young radical to old liberal. He was born in Birmingham, a descendant of the abolitionist Harriet Beecher Stowe. He left this American Bavaria a long time ago to the great relief of the city fathers. He was most recently in California, as an associate editor of Ramparts. Now he has come home, but not to roost. Between creative writing classes at Miles College he has been barnstorming Alabama, reading his poetry at every place that would have him. The combination of Alabama and Beecher's poetry makes the readings a very political gesture. At Samford University, a very conservative Baptist school in Birmingham, only a faculty protest restrained the adminstration from cancelling Beecher's invitation. Even so, the boy who invited Beecher found himself on probation for "being drunk." Currently Beecher is on a reading tour in Florida. This summer he did a benefit reading for SDS and he has been a friend of SSOC from the beginning.

I suppose that I'm trying to prove that Beecher is both a radical and a radical poet. To Live and Die in Dixie is his second volume of poetry. The title comes from a sequence of ten short poems about the Birmingham of Beecher's boyhood. Unfortunately, that brutal Birmingham is as durable as Beecher himself, and may outlive him yet. Auden says:

> For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives
> Only in the valley of its saying where executives
> Would never want to tamper;

Perhaps he is right, but we are lucky John Beecher doesn't believe it. The second poem of the title sequence may remind you of Bob Dylan, the late radical poet:

> Old Maggie's sweat would drip and sizzle > on that cast iron range she stoked > but she was grinding at the handle > of our great big ice cream freezer > that day she had her stroke
> It put a damper on my mother's luncheon
> All the ladies in their picture hats and organdies > hushed up until the ambulance took Maggie off > but soon I heard > their shrieks of laughter > like the bird house at the zoo > while they spooned in > their fresh peach cream

The rest of the book ranges from war to fraternities to even a few of those dirty personal poems. It includes a long dramatic narrative, "In Egypt Land," about a Negro sharecroppers' revolt in the thirties. This poem is twice itself when Beecher reads it.

Of all the Establishment poets, William Carlos Williams is probably closest to us in spirit, and Beecher is probably most like Williams. "Silent in Darien" should remind all the old English majors of Williams' "The Yachts." The poem is a view of the Canal Zone from the other side of the tracks:

Bloat-bellied, puny sex exposed, his brood clamors about his shack tin-cans and cartons built. Girls who survive turn assets, spreading rachitic legs to ease off-duty Yanqui personnel. His sons besides the pimping trade will follow such pursuits as untaught hands may ply for rice and beans, fare foreordained, lucky those days
They feed. In crystal shrines across the fence one sees prime cuts of beef--Por Dios!--milk, the precious nuggets of the hen enclosed in cunning boxes, bins of liquors, sweets, rare nutriments whose flavors, even names are mysterious, done up in shimmering foil.
The sky goes black as when a hurricane lowers from the Caribbean. Unobscured the sun glows bloody red. There will be wind.

In the SSOC library is a copy of Beecher's first volume, Report to the Stockholders, inscribed "To the White Folks' Project." The White Folks' Project in Mississippi in 1964 was where Gene Guerrero and Uncle Ed first told me to "get off my ass." They have said it since; so has John Beecher's poetry. That is what radical poetry is about. -endwield and increase whatever national political and economic leverage that we now possess. Men like Patman and Fulbright must be applauded when it is deserved; men like Rivers and Eastland must be reformed or defeated.

UP FROM IMPOTENCE

I realize, of course, that racism, militarism, violence and illiteracy must be wiped out; the things of which Brother Dabbs speaks--humility, sense of humor, basic humanity, love and compassion --must be refined. Over 35 years ago, 12 Southerners had this to say: "If a community, or a section...is groaning under industrialism, and well aware that it is an evil dispensation, it must find the way to throw it off. To think that this cannot be done is pusillanimous. And if the whole community, section, race, or age thinks it cannot be done, then it has simply lost its political genius and doomed itself to impotence."[6]

We must name the "evil dispensation" of today. We must decide to "throw it off." People in the villages of Vietnam refuse to admit impotence against the mightiest force in mankind's history. I pray that we learn some lesson from them. — — — — — —

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'?

Freedom Elections

Sunflower, Miss.: In the homeland of Senator James Eastland and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party's Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, the Sunflower County Improvement Association (a branch of the MFDP) is preparing for the special municipal elections to be held May 2.

The implication of these elections are many; they focus on the lack of federal protection for Negroes who want to vote in the South, and the lack of a sufficient number of federal registrars, etc.

Realizing this, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit on March 11, 1966 set aside elections in Sunflower Town and ordered the lower U.S. District Court to arrange for new elections.

Further questions about these elections may be addressed to:

Joseph Harris
Box 447
Sunflower, Miss.

Student Power

Orangeburg, S.C.: 800 black students at S.C. State College protested the suspension of three students who had called a demonstration to denounce the school's dismissal of two liberal professors. These students held an all-night sit-in and staged a boycott of their classes.

The three students were members of the Student Action Committee (SAC), a group which presented a 6-point petition to the administration demanding repeal of in loco parentis regulations, and the reinstatement of the suspended students and faculty members.

SAC requests that supporting telegrams be sent to President B.J. Turner at S.C. State with duplicates going to SAC, c/o James Huggins, Rt. 5, Box 539, Orangeburg, S.C.

We note that a suit is being filed against Western Union which thus far has not delivered approximately 500 duplicate telegrams to SAC, in an apparent move on the part of the college and state authorities to cut off support from SAC.

The Wansley Trial

Lynchburg, Va.: Hearings for 22-year-old accused rapist, Thomas Wansley, were renewed March 15th. Public indignation over the injustices involved in the black youth's unabated prosecution have aroused enough people to fill the courtroom and surround the court for a 3-block radius.

For four years the State of Virginia's efforts to kill Wansley have been largely ignored. But constant coverage of this trial by the Southern Patriot has finally begun to result in significant news coverage by major newspapers such as the N.Y. Times. More information about this case can be obtained from:

SCEF
3210 West Broadway
Louisville, Kentucky

University of Virginia

Charlottesville, Va.: Philip J. Hirschkop, civil rights lawyer from Alexandria Va. recently spoke at the University of Virginia. Hirschkop is a former counsel to SSOC and a founder of the Law Students Civil Rights Research Council.

His speech centered around Virginia's two most controversial cases: the anti-miscegenation suit that will soon be argued before the Supreme Court, and the Wansley trial in Lynchburg, Va.

Carl Braden of SCEF, in a March 7th speech sponsored by U.Va. SSOC gave in detail the state's efforts to execute young Wansley, in what can at best be described as "legal lynching".

The Virginia Weekly

The Virginia Weekly, "A Weekly Journal of News and Opinion", has published four issues at the University of Virginia which have been well received. Ex-SSOC chairman, Howard Romaine, is one of the three editors of this independent, student operated newspaper. Howard requests that all those who wish to support the campus free press, send contributions to: The Virginia Weekly, Box 336X, Newcomb Hall Station, Charlottesville, Virginia 22901.

If you are interested in receiving sample copies of this publication, send 10¢ and a stamped self-addressed envelope to the above address.

Focus Appalachia

Knoxville, Tenn.: A series of public programs devoted to Appalachia will be held at the Highlander Center between March 31 and April 14. The series is scheduled to precede the annual conference of the Council of Southern Mountains (April 12-14) to be held in Knoxville this year. Programs will include Appalachain history and economic development, labor history and songs, regional literature, music, folklore and crafts. Some of the resource people will be Dr. A. J. Sharp, Charles Counts, Florence and Sam Reese, Guy Carawan, Lee Pennington, Don West, Tom Ludwig, and Myles Horton.

Walk for Peace

Memphis, Tenn.: On Thursday, March 9 members of the Southern Mountain Walk for Peace met with students from Memphis State and Southwestern College. They spoke about the inequalities of the draft system and the anti-war position of conscientious objectors. With the encouragement of these visitors, 15 people have now decided to hold weekly vigils which will begin the week following Easter.

The Sheinbaum Affair

Southwestern students and SSOC members Barre Reed and Robert Orr requested the use of the campus auditorium for an appearance by Stanley Sheinbaum, consulting editor of Ramparts magazine. Dean of Men, Charles I. Diehl, son of a former S uthwestern president, replied that he "was not too keen on Mr. Sheinbaum". A week of administrative buck-passing ensued, ending with a flat refusal.

After receiving assurances that Mr. Sheinbaum was willing to participate in the face of the difficulties of the hostile administration, the Memphis group announced that it would bring Sheinbaum to the campus anyway. The administration did some dismayed foot-shuffling, and the hour before Sheinbaum arrived at the Memphis airport, extended the use of the student union to him personally thereby attempting to by-pass SSOC and avoid the issue of free speech. Mr. Sheinbaum did speak to about 50 people on "The University, the CIA, and the War".

SSOC Executive Committee Meeting

Nashville, Tenn.: The SSOC Executive Committee met here during the weekend of Feb. 24-26. A major decision was to have the membership conference at the end of April or mid-May. The topic will concern SSOC's political position and activities with respect to the rest of the movement. More information about the Executive Committee meeting will be forthcoming in the next membership mailing, or can be obtained from the office.

Staff changes announced at the meeting are:

Shirley L. Newton: Office manager
Lyn Wells: Campus traveller for N.C.
Janet Dewart: Campus traveller
Earl Wilson: Nashville office
Dave Nolan and Tom Gardner: Campus travellers, Florida Peace Caravan.

Capital Punishment

Students from Tennessee State and Fisk Universities accompanied by a SSOC staffer and the sister of the last man given the death penalty here (See Feb. NSS) had a half-hour discussion with Gov. Buford Ellington. They presented a petition of over 700 names, which had been circulated in Nashville and Memphis. A mailing was also sent to SSOC contacts in the state urging them to support the anti-capital punishment issue.

Nashville Anti-War Activity

On the Ides of March, LBJ came to this town to make a "major policy speech concerning Vietnam." Anti-war demonstrations resulted in the arrest of 3 SSOC staff members.

Nashville SNCC and four individual staff members co-sponsored a demonstration which involved students from Fisk, Tenn. State U., Vanderbilt U. and Peabody.

Interest in the Vietnam war is higher in Nashville than it has been for many months. Divinity students at Vanderbilt have formed an independent anti-war group; law students have been raising the issues through campus forums and films.

The Nashville Committee for Alternatives to War in Vietnam sponsored two speakers: Russell Johnson, former conference director in S.E. Asia for the AFSC, and Stanley Sheinbaum, consulting editor of Ramparts. Each drew sizable crowds, and much interest was shown in faculty seminars, reception, literature, etc. The Committee is presently working on a full page ad in response to LBJ's speech, to be published in the two local papers.

Nashville SSOC

On Saturday, March 18, a meeting of interested students from Vanderbilt and Peabody met with Nashville staff members to form an active chapter-at-large of SSOC. --END--

McNAMARA IN MISSISSIPPI

by Dave Doggett

On the evening of February 24, Secretary of Defense Robert Strange McNamara spoke at a Millsaps College fund drive convocation in Jackson, Mississippi. During the preceding three weeks anti-war forces in Jackson utilized McNamara's coming to organize a campaign against his presence in Jackson, and against the U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

On February 13 two Millsaps students (one a member of SSOC) spoke to a combined meeting of the Methodist Student Movement and the Newman Club (Catholic student group) at Millsaps presenting a history of the Vietnam war.

Breach of Contract

A small group of Millsaps students collected $15 and bought an ad protesting the draft in the school newspaper. The ad was at first received by the editor. But he was subjected to pressure from the school administration and the paper staff, and refused the ad. Three weeks later, after the paper was threatened with a breach of contract suit, the decision to refuse the ad was rescinded.

On Sunday, February 19, about 20 people from the Jackson Ad Hoc Committee to End the War in Vietnam distributed leaflets to people entering and leaving the churches in Jackson. Two white girls from Tougaloo were arrested in front of a downtown Baptist church. They had not broken a law, however, and were released after about an hour. That same night they went back to the church and were illegally arrested a second time and likewise were released.

On Thursday, February 23, 14 Millsaps students passed out leaflets to students going to weekly required chapel. The leaflets quoted contradictory and false statements made by McNamara and quoted American reporters on the war crimes and cruelties committed by U.S. and Saigon forces. The leaflet ended with the statements:

> McNamara has been dishonest with the American people. He is conducting an immoral and criminal war. Millsaps is prostituting its fund drive by gaining money through his reputation.

Anti-Peace Activity

Late Thursday night a cross was burned on the Millsaps campus and another was burned at the coliseum where McNamara was to speak. It was thought that the Ku Klux Klan burned the crosses because they consider McNamara an "appeaser".

The next day two of the anit-war leaders at Millsaps were called in to talk with the president of their school. He warned them that they were in danger of physical violence if they demonstrated at McNamara's speech and that their names were being placed on some type of "subversive" list that would endanger their future. The students interpreted this as an attempt to frighten them from demonstrating and "embarrassing" the administration.

The March

On Friday, February 24, a march in downtown Jackson climaxed the three week campaign. The march was composed of sixty-four people including students from Tougaloo, Millsaps, Jackson State College (a state Negro school), Alcorn A&M (state Negro school), and resident civil rights workers--this was twice as many as demonstrated against the war a year ago. The marchers marched down the main street of the black section of Jackson and picketed a Marine recruiting station located on the main street of the white section. The demonstrators wore black arm bands in sympathy and mourning for the one million Vietnamese children that have been casualties of American aggression in Vietnam.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL

. . . the AFL-CIO program

Introduction:

The AFL-CIO is for civil rights —without reservation and without delay.

The labor movement is dedicated to those truths that were self-evident to the authors of the Declaration of Independence. The rights so eloquently affirmed in 1776 are a sacred birthright of all in America, not subject to modification or denial because of race, creed or national origin.

Unfortunately, to the shame of the nation, discrimination still exists. It must be wiped out if the United States is to be truly the champion of freedom in a world where non-whites are an overwhelming majority.

Mere acknowledgment, mere lip-service to equal rights is not enough. The labor movement is committed to a positive program for translating principle into reality on every front. This means on the job, in the schools, at the polls, in housing and in all places of public accommodation—restaurants, hotels, everywhere.

Success will not come easily. The record of the last century proves that man's rights do not become established by declaring them to be valid; logic and reason do not automatically prevail over bigotry.

Unions know this well, out of their own experience. Unions were created to fight against injustice. They were instruments of protest, deplored by public officials and much of the citizenry. They were often accused of flagrant civil disobedience.

For example, many trade unionists no older than middle age can well remember when local ordinances or court injunctions forbade the holding of a union meeting, even on private property owned or rented by the union. The "right of the people peaceably to assemble" often had no local standing, despite the Constitution. Workers had no alternative; they followed the Constitution.

In the end the law was on their side. Local restrictions on the right of assembly were struck down by the Supreme Court. Civil disobedience has all but vanished as a trade union tactic because the rights of labor are now backed by the force of law. Surely the rights of man deserve no less.

It would be futile to pretend that the 13½ million members of AFL-CIO unions are without exception devoted to the cause of civil rights. They are a cross-section of America, and they reflect the diversity of the nation. But just as truly they reflect the American consensus. That consensus, expressed by AFL-CIO conventions and by conventions of the affiliated national and international unions, is the basis for the AFL-CIO's determination to abolish all forms of discrimination. It was the basis of our long and vigorous fight for enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; and it is the basis of our continuing campaign for the full observance of that law, in letter and spirit.

The AFL-CIO constitution invites "all workers, without regard to race, creed, color or national origin to share in the full benefits of union organization." We are pledged in equal measure to see that all workers share fully in every other aspect of American life; for our cause is the brotherhood of workers and the brotherhood of man.

George Meany

What rights does labor seek?

The AFL-CIO seeks to guarantee to every American every one of his basic American rights.

This means breaking the vicious circle which condemns a baby born in a segregated neighborhood to a childhood of segregated and sub-standard schools; to an adolescense of mounting discouragement and inadequate training; to an adulthood of joblessness or menial employment. All because of segregation.

The circle has a wider radius. The Negro who breaks through the economic barrier may still find no decent public place to eat, to sleep, to watch a play or film —no place, indeed, to vote.

The denial of rights must be ended, whether the victim suffers all the injustices in the vicious circle, which is the rule, or even only one.

"These wrongs cry for correction," the AFL-CIO said in its convention policy statement on civil rights, "and it is the responsibility of all of us, individually and collectively, to work diligently for that correction." No sudden redemption will overnight dissolve the hate and fear within a racist's heart or give new faith to a householder whose veneer of tolerance cracks at the cry, "The colored are moving in." Laws cannot wipe out prejudice of the spirit; but laws, vigorously enforced, can abolish prejudice in practice.

The AFL-CIO seeks the total elimination of racial and religious discrimination from American society —the smashing of the vicious circle—by every possible democratic means.

Can labor achieve these rights?

Yes—but not alone. Labor can play a vital role, but cannot do the job single handed.

Since its formative years the labor movement has sought, with considerable success, to broaden and extend all rights—economic, social and political. Among the first union goals, almost a century and a half ago, was a free, universal public school system. Unions proclaimed the objective. Unions lobbied for it in state legislatures. Union parents took the lead in community movements, organized to promote the cause. But the achievement was possible only because, as a result of labor's efforts, a majority of all the people came to support it.

This was true in the enactment of the civil rights bill; it has even greater truth in its implementation. The AFL-CIO can, should and does provide leadership, exert pressure, serve as a rallying-point for the forces of justice. But the ultimate victory requires the full and united efforts of all people of good will.

What has been accomplished?

In the perspective of history the progress over the last two decades has been tremendous. Some triumphs have been dramatic; the unforgettable day of the Supreme Court decision on school segregation was one example; the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was another.

And during all this time, labor-supported (and often labor-initiated) measures have been enacted by states and municipalities, with painful and painstaking effort, so that today there are 25 states and scores of cities with fair employment practices laws, and dozens that outlaw discrimination in housing and public accommodations. Meanwhile, beyond the statute books, innumerable communities have quietly obliterated the influence of anti-catholicism, anti-semitism and Jim Crow.

Yes, in the last 20 years—against the background of the previous 80—the gains have been spectacular. But quite properly we of the AFL-CIO look, not to history, but to the here and now. A new law has been enacted, at long last, which represents a comprehensive breakthrough in civil rights on almost every front. But the law is a beginning, not the end. It asserts rights; it does not give them day-to-day reality. The law's success is in the hands of the people.

What does the AFL-CIO intend to do now?

Immediately after the civil rights bill was signed into law, the AFL-CIO started work on a program to insure its full effectiveness. The basic elements of this program include the following:

☆ EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Utmost efforts will be exerted to achieve voluntary compliance with this section of the law before it takes official effect in July 1965. Employment rights are, of course, a major concern of unions. But it is an indisputable fact that unions do not control employment—employers do.

Nevertheless, unions can and will—in both organized and unorganized establishments—make a significant contribution to the achievement of voluntary compliance with this section of the law, Title 7.

Our objective in the AFL-CIO is to achieve the spirit and intent of the law now, not months from now. So particular attention must be paid to the voluntary institution of fair employment practices.

Non-discrimination clauses have been negotiated in many union contracts and have been enforced through contract grievance procedure. All affiliated AFL-CIO unions are again urged to step up their efforts in this direction. But unorganized companies must not be allowed to evade their responsibilities. Careful note must be made of those employers who comply with the law and those who resist it; the latter should naturally be the focus of enforcement.

In this community endeavor, the state and city central bodies will clearly play a key role, and the AFL-CIO Department of Civil Rights will assist them in fulfilling it and will coordinate their efforts. Contacts ought to be made with employers in each area in an effort to enlist their cooperation.

Meanwhile the AFL-CIO will continue to press for the indispensable prerequisite to genuine equality of opportunity—jobs at good wages for all. It is an empty gesture to give Negroes an equal chance at jobs if there are no jobs to be had.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS

Close working relationships have been established in recent years, both nationally and locally, between AFL-CIO and other organizations devoted to civil rights. These relationships must be maintained and strengthened. Bi-racial committees have been set up in many communities; AFL-CIO central bodies have been active participants. Such committees should be established in every community. Efforts must also be made to expand them by bringing in groups, such as employer organizations, which remained aloof while civil rights legislation was pending.

To this end the operations of the community task forces set up in the AFL-CIO Department of Civil Rights will be greatly broadened. The major role of these task forces is to assist AFL-CIO state and city central bodies in establishing community-wide committees that will facilitate the attainment of equal opportunity in the schools, in all public facilities and in places of public accommodation. For the year it has been in operation, the task force experiment has proved its worth. It will now be greatly expanded, and many more teams will be sent into the field.

All this is in keeping with the AFL-CIO's long-standing recognition that legislation is not enough—that there must also be a complementary effort to bring about community action, through bi-racial committees, to eradicate all discrimination, whether in the bus depot or the classroom. As noted earlier, the drive for civil rights will succeed only when it has enlisted a consensus of the American people—as we believe it now has.

Throughout America the AFL-CIO, with its 130 national and international unions, its nearly 900 state and local central bodies and the 60,000 local unions which are the basic units in the labor movement's structure, is helping to mobilize this kind of consensus. What is said in Washington has little meaning unless it is given direct application in the community. It is the responsibility of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department to coordinate with civil rights representatives in central labor bodies and in international unions on specific projects and long-range programs. In each community, unions are urged to carry out vigorous civil rights programs of their own and expand on these through their central labor bodies and civil rights-minded organizations.

☆ EDUCATION

Essential to the success of the objectives above, and to all other phases of civil rights, is public understanding. All staff departments of the AFL-CIO, and its regional directors, have been enlisted in a wide-ranging educational program to make sure that all citizens, including union members, know what the law provides and how its various provisions are to be enforced. The affiliated national and international unions are also a part of this program, being responsible for its application within their own ranks.

☆ ENFORCEMENT

Many a good law has been hobbled by inadequate funds or indifferent administration. The AFL-CIO position was made clear in an Executive Council resolution:

"The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions will insist upon adequate funds and vigorous administration of the Civil Rights Act. We will not allow the act to be emasculated by lack of funds, a back-door attack which has hobbled so many social measures in the past. This must not be the fate of the greatest social advance in a century."

☆ NEW LEGISLATION

The AFL-CIO will watch with great care the operations of the Civil Rights Act in the months ahead. If unexpected loopholes develop, or if the administrative and enforcement processes prove to be unworkable, the AFL-CIO will not hesitate to seek from Congress whatever changes in the law that experience proves to be necessary.

What is being done inside unions?

In all AFL-CIO unions, every member is equal, and enjoys all the rights enjoyed by any other member. This alone is not enough, of course, and unions have long been aware of it. To be a union member a worker must first be hired; this is why a legal ban on discriminatory hiring has been an AFL-CIO goal for so many years. But in the meantime, unions have fought to negotiate non-discrimination clauses covering hiring, wage rates and upgrading; such agreements are operative in every geographical area, and their numbers increase yearly. This process will soon be reinforced by law, and properly so; and it is being reinforced today by the application of AFL-CIO policy.

In scores of plants throughout the south, once-separate Negro and white locals have been merged and seniority lists consolidated. There is no color line in the benefits provided by union contracts. Union meetings and the facilities in union halls are generally unsegregated, often in defiance of local custom and even local law.

Major unions that have apprenticeship programs forbid discrimination both by constitution and contracts. Some now offer schooling to help Negroes and others with sub-standard educations to catch up and be better able to meet apprenticeship requirements.

The AFL-CIO has forbidden its own subsidiary organizations and departments to hold meetings, conventions or conferences in segregated facilities. This ruling is binding on state and local central bodies, COPE area conferences, educational institutes and all other functions directly under AFL-CIO control.

All this is not meant to suggest that unions are blameless. There was even a time when discrimination was "respectable" in some national unions as it was in most of America. But today, as George Meany has expressed it, discrimination in the trade union movement is a "bootleg product," sneaked in by the back door and nowhere condoned.

In the labor movement even a little discrimination is too much. To the AFL-CIO the important consideration is not how much has been accomplished but what remains to be done.

Is there AFL-CIO machinery for handling civil rights grievances?

Yes, and not just on paper. The AFL-CIO Civil Right Committee, headed by the federation's second ranking officer, is charged with the obligation of carrying out the uncompromising declarations of the AFL-CIO conventions.

A special subcommittee on compliance hears, investigates and acts upon all complaints. It utilizes the staff of the AFL-CIO Department of Civil Rights to explore the issues and make initial referrals to the unions involved. Final action, if necessary, is determined by the full Civil Rights Committee; and ultimately by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The Civil Rights Committee also works closely with appropriate federal agencies concerned with civil rights. It will, through the Department of Civil Rights, be in constant touch with those charged with enforcing the new fair employment practices law.

Is the civil rights issue turned against unions?

Yes indeed; it has for nearly a generation been the chief weapon of union foes in the south, and more recently has become the favorite bludgeon of right-wing extremists everywhere.

The very fact that unions believe that "all men are created equal" was an anti-labor weapon long before the Supreme Court took the same view. Race-baiting of the most virulent kind is standard practice in any southern organizing campaign, and has been widely employed in attempts to disrupt established unions. Labor's stand on civil rights has even been injected into wholly unrelated legislative issues.

AFL-CIO President George Meany gave labor's answer in an address several years ago—an answer that still stands. He said:

"If we have to practice discrimination to organize workers, then organizing will have to wait until we educate the unorganized.

"If we have to lose a vote in Congress . . . because we take a stand on civil rights, that is a price we are prepared to pay."

Currently the radical right has taken up the segregationist outcry, charging that fair employment practices means an artificial quota system that would force the discharge of senior white workers to make room for Negroes. This, of course, is absurd.

It is true that a seniority system which systematically discriminates against Negroes can now be overthrown. The AFL-CIO is in full accord with that.

But the seniority system itself, where fairly administered, is left untouched by the law. The AFL-CIO is in full accord with that, too. The job safeguards built up by the labor movement over the years—including the seniority system—are important to all workers. They are color-blind.

These safeguards have special importance to members of minority groups, who might otherwise be subject to discrimination by an unthinking majority in times of stress. To destroy these safeguards would be an inter-racial disaster.

What is the AFL-CIO's relationship with civil rights groups?

The AFL-CIO works with all men and organizations of good faith, of proven adherence to the spirit and substance of democracy, whether they be special local committees, permanent civil rights organizations, church groups or government agencies. This has been the policy of the AFL-CIO on all issues.

What is the employers' record?

The answer to this question is a sad and shameful reflection on the leaders of American business and industry. There are, to be sure, a number of employers who for many years have followed a fully non-discriminatory policy. But all the major organizations which purport to speak for employers, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, the U. S. Chamber of Commerce and the American Retail Federation, openly and actively opposed fair employment practices legislation.

Newspaper stories early in 1964 told of a growing alliance between employers and right-wing extremist organizations, with opposition to FEP as the chief goal. Some employers tried to justify their position on the grounds that an FEP law would be "excessive government interference;" yet they made no move to eliminate discrimination themselves.

In some cases, at least, the disgraceful attitude of employers may have had an economic motive. According to a Department of Commerce survey, the average income of a white family in 1961 was $5,570; the average for a Negro family was $2,908. This spells low Negro wages; this is what some employers want. Where equal employment opportunities have been won by Negroes, the record shows that unions have in almost every instance led or actively participated in the fight—almost always against last-ditch resistance by employer spokesmen. And unless protected by union contract or by law, the Negro generally continues to be the lowest paid, the last hired and the first fired.

Can legislation alone win the rights struggle?

No. The legislation just enacted was a major step forward, but a law standing alone is meaningless. There must be vigorous action on two other fronts before the words of the law can become facts of life.

On the technical, legalistic front, there must be effective enforcement machinery supported by adequate funds. Congress has failed to do this for earlier civil rights measures; it must not fail on this one. In a very real sense, the mechanism for enforcing the law is as important as the law itself.

And on the broader front of public opinion, the law must be supplemented by full community action. Those who opposed the law argued that discrimination is a personal rather than a statutory matter, and to eliminate it, there must be a change in the minds and hearts of men.

In one respect they were right. The law should—and does—brand racial discrimination as an offense against the basic principles of American democracy. This is the plain truth. But in order to prevail, the truth must be understood and accepted.

The community programs of the AFL-CIO, described earlier, are one means toward this end. There must be many more, in and out of the labor movement. The quest for true brotherhood in the hearts of men has been pursued too long for any among us to expect instant victory. Yet it is a quest to which the AFL-CIO is irrevocably dedicated.

CIVIL # RIGHTS

Statement adopted by
AFL-CIO Executive Council
Chicago, Aug. 4, 1964

One month ago the Civil Rights Act of 1964 became the law of the land. That historic event, so long awaited, marked the beginning of a new struggle to translate the rights thus confirmed by Congress into living reality in every phase of American life.

This new struggle will demand even greater dedication, even closer unity, even harder work and even more patience than the legislative effort itself. To that end the AFL-CIO pledges its unremitting efforts.

A first requisite is to keep in being the spirit of unity in the ranks of civil rights supporters, in which the AFL-CIO proudly served, and to enlist new adherents to this cause.

There are many organizations—civic, business and professional—which over the last year and a half have either been in opposition to certain aspects of civil rights legislation or have stood aloof from the struggle. Now the circumstances have changed. The issue today is not whether there should be a civil rights law, or what it should embrace, but rather its orderly implementation. Therefore the time has come for participation in civil rights affairs of organizations which have not participated up to now.

All these, and law-abiding citizens everywhere, should be drawn into a drive to make the national consensus a national reality. It is true, and properly so, that behind this new Bill of Rights for America there stands the enforcement powers of the fedeal government, and those powers should be fully applied. Yet to be truly effective, to fulfill its high aspirations, the Civil Rights Act must rely upon the goodwill of friends and neighbors in every community in our land.

In all of this the labor movement has a special obligation, as the AFL-CIO has long recognized.

That obligation is especially keen with respect to Title 7 of the law, relating to equal employment opportunities.

The record confirms beyond dispute that the labor movement—AFL and CIO separately, and the AFL-CIO since merger—has, since World War II, been the major advocate of equal employment opportunities legislation, applicable to unions and employers alike.

The law as written delays enforcement of equal employment opportunities for a year. The AFL-CIO cannot and will not wait on the letter of the law; the spirit of the law looks to voluntary compliance and so do we.

Therefore we hereby call a national conference of union leaders, including the officers of national and international unions, of state central bodies and of such local central bodies as shall be designated by the president of the AFL-CIO, to meet in Washington, D. C. on September 2, at a time and place to be designated by the president.

This conference will be charged with the responsibility for formulating and planning the implementation of the following measures, among others:

1. The education of union members and other citizens as to the actual terms of the Civil Rights Act. The Departments of Civil Rights, Legislation, Education, Public Relations, Community Services, and Publications, are instructed to draw up a program, with the assistance of their colleagues in the affiliated unions, to make sure all union officials and members understand the facts of the law and their meaning. All departments of the AFL-CIO and its regional directors are instructed to see to it that such a program of education is effectuated.

2. The work that has been carried on by AFL-CIO community task forces is to be greatly broadened. Achievement of equal opportunity in our schools, in all public facilities and in all places of public accommodation is a cause on which all elements in our communities must and should unite. The state and city central bodies of the AFL-CIO can make a significant contribution to this work, operating through community-wide committees with religious, civic and civil rights organizations.

3. As we noted above, promotion of equal opportunity in employment is a major concern of unions. Unions, of course, do not control employment. But unions can—in both organized and unorganized companies—make a significant contribution to achieving voluntary compliance with this section of the law long before the effective date of Title 7. Therefore, particular attention will be given to the voluntary achievement of fair employment practices, among organized and unorganized employers alike. Non-discrimination clauses have been negotiated in many union contracts and have been enforced through contract grievance procedure. All AFL-CIO unions are again urged to step up their efforts along these lines. But the unorganized companies must not be allowed to evade their responsibilities. Careful note will be kept of the employers who comply with the principles of the law, and of those who do not. The latter should clearly be the focus of enforcement.

4. The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions will insist upon adequate funds and vigorous administration of the Civil Rights Act. We will not allow the act to be emasculated by lack of funds, a back-door attack which has hobbled so many social measures in the past. This must not be the fate of the greatest social advance in a century.

5. In the months ahead, every AFL-CIO organization, at every level, is called upon to observe the workings of the Civil Rights Act, so that any inadequacies which may develop in practice can be presented to Congress for further legislative action. It is our hope that if the other steps in this program are fully carried out, such action may be unnecessary.

All the foregoing is said in the full realization that the practical realization of the goals set forth in the Civil Rights Act requires more than vigorous enforcement, more than full compliance with the law itself.

It cannot be said too often that for equal rights and equal opportunity to be meaningful, there must be full opportunity as well; full employment, full educational opportunities and all the rest. The right to be hired is empty indeed when there are no jobs to be had; the right to be served in a restaurant or hotel has no meaning for those with no money to spend.

In that sense the fight to create jobs for all, and to abolish poverty in America, are themselves civil rights campaigns, indispensable to the success of the law which bears that title. The AFL-CIO will press for these goals as vigorously as we campaigned for the Civil Rights Act itself.

The AFL-CIO is uncomprisingly opposed to racial discrimination of every sort, in every place and at every time. And we are determined to stamp it out, not only through the full implementation of the law enacted a month ago, but also through the elimination of the economic and social weaknesses which are so largely responsible for it.

Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is a new bill of rights for everyone, regardless of race, creed or color.

This basic fact has been overlooked, ignored or distorted by those who are opposed to equal rights for anyone.

This is—in capsule form—what the act provides:

JOBS: Starting in July 1965, discrimination and segregation in employment, or in unions, is forbidden. Complaints will be processed through state agencies; the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission acts only if a state fails to act.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS: Effective at once, every hotel, restaurant, theater or other facility catering to the general public must do exactly that. Thirty-one state laws, already in effect have even stronger provisions.

SCHOOLS: The Attorney General of the United States has greater power to implement the Supreme Court decision of 1954 prohibiting segregation in public schools.

VOTING RIGHTS: Both the federal courts and the Attorney General are instructed to make sure registration and voting rights are safeguarded under uniform, reasonable standards.

There are other provisions in the law; a detailed analysis is available free of charge from the AFL-CIO. But these are the basic points.

Enemies of civil rights, enemies of labor, enemies of democracy itself are spreading lies about the terms of the act in order to play upon the fears of homeowners, parents, employers and workers. Here is the truth about the kind of lies that are told:

FICTION: "If you sell a house, you have to sell to a Negro."

FACT: The AFL-CIO believes that discrimination in housing should be ended. But there is no reference whatever to housing in the Civil Rights Act.

FICTION: "Your children will be sent out of the neighborhood to some Negro school."

FACT: Local school boards in some cities, operating under state and local statutes, have instituted pupil transfers in an effort to achieve better racial balance in their schools. But there is no such requirement in the Civil Rights Act, which provides only that schools must not be segregated.

FICTION: "A certain number of Negroes will have to be hired on every job, even if white people have to be fired to make room for them."

FACT: This is a myth. The law will properly put an end to discrimination in employment —including discrimination in seniority systems. But it does not in any way interfere with existing job rights. There are no "quotas" established. As a matter of fact, "inverse discrimination," even if intended to offset past evils, would actually be a violation of the law.

In short, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in letter and spirit, is dedicated to justice—to the principles of democracy and fair play which are in the highest American tradition.

UNION MEN WARN ON ETHNIC QUOTAS

New State Law to Regulate Apprentice Plans Scored

Construction union leaders charged yesterday that new state regulations on apprentice training programs might lead to ethnic quotas.

The law, which goes into effect tomorrow, sets objective standards as the criteria for admission of apprentices to union. It is aimed at ending discrimination by some unions against Negroes as an outgrowth of giving apprentice preference to the sons and other relatives of members.

The new law was criticized by speakers at the closing session of a two-day convention by the New York State Building and Construction Trades Council at the Commodore Hotel.

Their criticism came after an address by the State Industrial Commissioner, Martin P. Catherwood. Under the new regulations, the State Labor Department has the power to review the joint employer-union programs that are registered with the state.

Mr. Catherwood said that the new regulations involved a "complex, emotion-charged, delicate area," adding: "It takes a Philadelphia lawyer to understand all of the angles of the regulations."

Called Totalitarian

William Sorenson, business agent of the Dutchess County Local of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, described the regulations as "totalitarian."

George Grimm, secretary-treasurer of the Westchester Building Trades Council, said most unions were making "substantial strides" to overcome discrimination and that the new law was unnecessary. "It will cause more difficulties than do good," he added.

Criticism was also directed against State Supreme Court Justice Jacob Markowitz for his ruling last week involving Sheet Metal Workers Local 28.

Justice Markowitz had upheld a finding by the State Commission for Human Rights that Local 28 had [illegible] and exclude [illegible] in doing so [illegible] training to the relatives of its members.

Peter J. Brennan, president of the Building and Construction Trades Council, said yesterday that Justice Markowitz's ruling was "only the opinion of one judge and can be appealed."

Nepotism in union training was defended by John Lyons, general president of the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers.

"We are entitled to give some preference to the sons of our members," he declared.

Most of South's 567,000 Textile Workers Likely to Be Affected by Wage Increases

Econ. - So 9/2/64

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

CHARLOTTE, N.C.—A spreading pattern of wage increases appears likely to soon cover nearly all the South's 567,000 textile workers.

Harriet-Henderson Mills, Henderson, N.C., apparently set the trend last month when it announced a 5% increase for its 1,100 employes. Cannon Mills, Kannapolis, N.C., followed 10 days later with an announcement it would make a "pay adjustment" for its workers. And the same day, Alice Manufacturing Co., Easley, S.C., said it also was giving its 1,250 employes a 5% increase.

A number of additional textile producers rapidly followed, including Cone Mills Corp., Greensboro, N.C., which announced bigger paychecks for 13,000 workers but declined to specify the amount of the increase. H. W. Close, president of Springs Cotton Mills, said pay rises for nearly 16,000 employes would add $2,650,000 to the annual payrolls of the parent company and its subsidiary, Scotland Mills.

Burlington Industries and J. P. Stevens Co., are announcing increases on a plant-by-plant basis. A recent tally showed three Stevens facilities and two owned by Burlington Industries affected by the pay boosts.

Many companies said the increases reflected the industry's improved economic health following passage of the one-price cotton law passed by Congress earlier this year. The new law provides for equalization payments to U.S. mills, enabling them to produce cloth as cheaply as foreign competitors who had benefited from the ability to purchase U.S. cotton well below the domestic price.

Though company officials have declined to acknowledge union pressure, the equalization payments have been cited by union organizers to recruit new members. The Textile Workers Union of America is continuing distribution of a pamphlet entitled: Your Employer Has Grabbed All the Benefits for Himself."

Scott Hoyman, assistant coordinator of the AFL-CIO industrial union department in Charlotte, termed the pay rises "a side effect of our organizing drive. It has been a tradition that many companies give raises to keep people from seeking union help." At the present time, only about 15% of Southern textile workers are represented by unions.

No one actually knows how many workers have been affected thus far. But in North Carolina, the leading textile state with 165,000 workers in basic textile plants, one industry source estimates that between 75,000 and 100,000 employes have gained pay boosts.

"If this wage increase follows the pattern of previous increases, it's likely to be general throughout the industry," said an official of the American Cotton Manufacturers Institute, Inc., a trade organization. "A mill can't stay in business unless it follows the pattern of other mills."

Prior to the recent increases, hourly wages in textile mills nationally averaged $1.71; the industry's total annual wages and salary payroll was $3.7 billion.

It's also likely the pay rises will affect related industries. American Thread, Clover, S.C., and Kayser-Roth Hosiery Co., Burlington, N.C., for example, are among companies that have announced 5% increases. Rock Hill Printing and Finishing Co., a division of M. Lowenstein & Sons, also said it was increasing pay of 3,730 workers by 8 cents an hour. And Hanes Dye & Finishing Co. of Winston-Salem boosted wages 7 cents to $1.76 an hour.

Direct Effects of the New Civil Rights Bill on Trade Unionism

WASHINGTON (PAI) — What impact will the new Civil Rights Bill have on trade unions?

Louis Sherman, general counsel for the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department, has prepared a factual digest to answer this question.

The digest follows:

1—Effective Dates: The sections of the bill, as passed by the Senate, which establish unlawful employment practices by employers, labor unions and employment agencies and provide for legal enforcement proceedings do NOT become effective until one year after the date of the law's enactment. For employers of less than 50 workers and for unions with less than 50 members, these sections of the bill will be delayed four years from date of enactment; employers of less than 75 and unions of less than 75, three years' delay; employees and unions of less than 100, two years. However, unions with hiring halls or referral systems, regardless of the number of members; becomes subject to these provisions of the law one year after enactment. Unions with less than 25 members, not operating a hiring hall or referral system, are not subject to the provisions of the bill at any time.

2—Immediately Effective: Those provisions which provide for (1) the establishment of an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission of five members, which is empowered to cooperate with Local and State agencies and others, to conciliate, to refer legal matters to the Attorney General and to prescribe record-keeping regulations (2) posting by employers and labor unions of notices prescribed by the Commission which set forth pertinent excerpts from the Civil Rights Bill and information concerning the filing of complaints, and (3) the convening of conferences by the President of the United States to acquaint leaders of groups affected by the bill with its provisions and requirements and to plan for the

3—Unlawful Employment Practices: The bill prohibits discrimination against any individual because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin and specifically prohibits the following acts:

By a Labor Union

(1) Discriminatory exclusion or expulsion from membership.

(2) Discriminatory segregation or classification of membership or referral practices which tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect employee status.

(3) Causing or attempting to cause an employer to discriminate.

By an Employer

(1) Discriminatory failure or refusal to hire or discharge, or other discrimination with respect to compensation, terms, conditions or privileges of employment.

(2) Discriminatory segregation or classification of employees which tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect employee status.

Joint Apprenticeship Committees or employers or unions are likewise prohibited from discrimination in admission to or employment in any program established to provide apprenticeship or other training.

Employment agencies are prohibited from discriminatory failure or refusal to refer for employment.

4—Quota System Banned: The bill does not require any racial "balance" or quota systems. The specific language of the bill provides that:

"Nothing contained in this title shall be interpreted to require any employer, employment agency, labor organization or joint labor-management committee subject to this title to grant preferential treatment to any individual or group because of the race, color, religion, sex or national origin of such individual or group on account of an imbalance which may exist with respect to to total number or percentage of persons of any race, color, religion, munity, State, section or other area, or in the available work force in any community, State, section or other area."

5—Further Exceptions: The bill excepts from its provisions cases where "religion, sex or national origin" is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary to the normal operation of the particular business; where an educational institution controlled by a particular religious group employs persons of such religion; where the discriminatory action taken is with respect to members of Communists or front organizations; where national security is affected and where preference may be given to an Indian living on or near an Indian reservation.

6—Enforcement Procedures: Adequate opportunity is given to State and local agencies under State and local anti-discrimination laws to work out complaints of discrimination before Federal Action is taken. The Federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is empowered to investigate charges and to seek conciliation of discrimination cases when the State and local agencies have not been able to accomplish results.

7—If Conciliation Fails: Then the individual complainant may sue in the Federal courts. The District Judge may, in his discretion, appoint an attorney for the complainant and allow reasonable attorney's fees to the prevailing party in the case, except when the Federal Government itself prevails. In the case of "intentional" violation, the court may enjoin the violation and order hiring or reinstatement of employees with back pay. The Commission may institute proceedings to compel compliance after a judicial decree has been issued.

8—The Attorney General also is empowered to step in and bring a civil action in the Federal courts when he has "reasonable cause" to believe that any person or group, including labor unions, "is engaged fied for employment by any employment agency or labor organization, admitted to membership or classified by any labor organization, or admitted to, or employed in, any apprenticeship or other training program, in comparison with the total number or percentage of persons of such race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in any com-

AUTOMATIC WORRY

LONDON (PAI) — A study released by the British Medical Association here shows that assembly line technology has produced anxiety in the average worker.

He is bored, concerned about the dangerous work around the machines, fearful of unemployment and just downright worried about his future in the age of automation.

and judicial appeal. Certainly, the claimant has the opportunity to refute this new information, but what about the resulting delay? What about the economic hardship for most claimants in such a situation?

Upon asking at the Employment Department for information about filing an appeal, including the procedure, admissibility of written statements, availability of transcripts, etc., he was told that the only information available would be printed on notices received by mail, "and this information has amounted to practically nothing. Thus, in an appeal, the claimant goes virtually unprepared to face the combined resources of his former employer."

Noting that his costs will be far greater than the two weeks of compensation involved, the businessman says he will "pursue this matter, if necessary, all the way through the Industrial Commission and a civil court action."

But he asks:

"Over and above the factor of damage to professional reputation and work history, what about the factor of delay? This claim already has taken more than seven weeks to process and we are really no farther along than when we started. What if I had not found another job?"

of the rights secured by this title (Title 7)." In any criminal contempt proceeding, brought when a defendant is alleged to have violated a court decree, the accused shall have the right to a jury trial and the maximum penalty shall be a $1,000 fine or imprisonment for six months.

Supplementing the preceding digest, the following comments excerpted from an analysis of the problem of equal rights in employment, prepared by J. Albert Woll, counsel for the AFL-CIO, contain some pertinent information:

"Some 25 states now have laws, of one kind or another, forbidding discrimination in employment. In addition, the Supreme Court has ruled that a labor organization serving as a statutory bargaining agent under the Railway Labor Act or the National Labor Relations Act has an obligation to represent all employees in the bargaining unit fairly and impartially. An employee whose right to fair representation is violated may bring a civil action in Federal Court against the union and any employer joining in the union's wrongdoing. Finally, the National Labor Relations Board has taken the position that it may revoke the certification of a union which practices racial discrimination in the representation of employees. Existing statutes, voluntary union procedures and Federal administrative practices thus provide a wide range of weapons which can be brought to bear against racial discrimination in employment."

"Title 7 (of the Civil Rights Bill) would not apply retroactively . . . Mathematical equality is not the goal of the bill. Neither is the righting of old wrongs by the process of perpetrating new ones. The bill looks to the future, not the past, and does not endeavor to discriminate against whites tomorrow because Negroes were discriminated against yesterday."

"If members of one race, because higher seniority or any other legitimate employment qualifications, should wind up with a disproportionately large number of jobs on a particular project, this would not constitute a violation of the proposed legislation."

History or Chronicle?

ORGANIZED LABOR IN AMERICAN HISTORY
By Philip Taft
Harper & Row. 818 pp. $12.50.

Reviewed by
BEN B. SELIGMAN
Author, "Main Currents in Modern Economics"

PHILIP TAFT, an indefatigable burrower among files, documents, diaries, notebooks, old magazines and other assorted archival artifacts, has produced another enormous chronicle of American labor. For bulk and detail, it stands very well next to his huge two-volume history of the AFL published a few years ago. No doubt it will be an important source for those who want to verify obscure facts about labor's past. But whether it provides a sense of history, or a feeling for the palpable human thrust that seeks to create a movement, is moot.

Professor Taft's industry is prodigious and in some ways quite admirable, but unfortunately he is not able to distinguish between history and chronicle. Organization after organization parades before the reader; the names of sundry officers are listed; the numerous conventions are tabulated and the debates summarized—yet after all the items have been neatly packaged, one still does not really know the place of organized labor in American history.

Unionism's sole function for Taft is in the work place. American unions, he asserts, always have been exponents of "business unionism" and always have eschewed broad programs of social and political change. Curiously enough, his own recitation belies this judgment: The Workingmens' Party in the 1820s, the old AFL's concern with legislation, the Farmer-Labor Party after World War I and the present Committee on Political Education suggest that there is more to trade unionism than the old walking-delegate philosophy. True, Taft has put all of this into his book and more besides, but at no point is he able to reach the essential spirit that moved men to form themselves into organizations for protection against the crushing burdens of an expanding industrialism.

Unions can hardly become viable institutions if they limit themselves solely to job issues. There are those who would argue that unions should help meet the broader needs of their members, for only by doing so can they enhance their abilities to organize and to bargain collectively. For it is evident that no line can be drawn between the worker as employe and the worker as citizen, between the union as bargaining agent and the union as social institution.

In fact, there are any number of problems confronting unionism today—such as automation—that in no way can be solved through ordinary "business" methods. Politics affects such matters as minimum wages and labor law as much as it does the decision of a company to resist union demands. And workers willy-nilly must be concerned with taxation, Social Security, housing legislation and the myriad of economic questions perennially weighed by Congressmen. Despite the several chapters in his book on politics and legislation none of this seems of great import to Taft. It is all submerged by a vast flood of isolated facts.

I really don't know why Taft writes this way; after all, he has been publishing books on labor for over 30 years now. Perhaps the problem stems from his insistence on the continued usefulness of the sort of economic history offered by John R. Commons, one of his revered mentors. Commons, it will be recalled, had argued, rather naively, that alterations in market structure underpinned economic change. Thus the development of retail and wholesale markets in the 17th and 18th Centuries, thought Commons, explained how it was that workers were separated from their tools to become mere employes. Eventually, to protect themselves, they were impelled to organize into unions, through which the characteristic market orientation of capitalism could be expressed as pressure for "more and more."

This now archaic interpretation results in a number of curiosities: The Molly Maguires were just a gang of cutthroats and murderers whose actions had no relation to the harshness of their lives in the mines; the early steel unions had been overly militant at the turn of the century; the unions' fear of Chinese immigration stemmed solely from job fear rather than racist sentiments; Taft-Hartley was a "non-punitive law which scarcely affected the position of organized labor"; and incidents such as Haymarket really had little to do with unionism and the labor movement.

I may be forgiven perhaps one somewhat personal observation: My own organization, the Retail Clerks International Association—one of the larger affiliates of the AFL-CIO—has had a regular and steady growth since 1944 and now speaks for over 400,000 employes in the white collar field. In existence since 1888, its history is fairly interesting, at least interesting enough to have been the subject of two recent studies as well as innumerable student dissertations. Yet Taft can find nothing more to say about the RCIA than a slighting reference to an incident that occurred around 1898! My point is this: If the future growth of the American labor movement is to be in the white collar field, as many contend, then ought not labor historians say something meaningful about union developments in that area?

Taft's book once again demon-

A READING OF PROUST
By Wallace Fowlie
Doubleday Anchor Books
307 pp. $1.45.

Reviewed by
GEORGE WOODCOCK
Author, "The Paradox of Oscar Wilde," "The Writer and Politics," etc.

THE LITERARY guide for the uninitiate has become a genre characteristic of the '60s. Easy introductions to Eliot, Faulkner, Joyce, and Yeats proliferate, and they are understandably popular among publishers, since there is a ready-made market among the thousands of undergraduates who are seeking quick and simple ways of understanding at least the obvious points about the authors they are expected to study. Wallace Fowlie has already provided two such guides, to contemporary French literature and to the contemporary French theater; now, in A Reading of Proust, he performs the same service for one of the most important modern French writers.

To addicted readers of Proust everything in his vast novel seems so clear within its convolutions, so irradiated with inner light, every connection seems so appropriate and every clue so necessary, that the idea of anyone needing a guide to this world of the shaping imagination seems extraordinary. But an hour struggling to explain the ordered complexity of A la recherche du temps perdu to an audience of sophomores is likely to make even a Proustian realize the usefulness of some kind of chart to direct unaccustomed readers along Proust's devious and multitudinous paths.

In providing such a chart Professor Fowlie follows the obvious and probably the best expository plan by first placing Proust in the context of French literary history, next recording basic biographical facts with the caution that, as Proust himself contended, a successful work of art stands in the end as a distillation but not a mirror of its creator's life, and finally by dealing consecutively with the six volumes of A la recherche du temps perdu. He ends with a summarizing chapter discussing "the Esoteric in Proust."

A paraphrase of any work of literature is a poor substitute for the real thing, particularly when the real thing is as rich and intricate and as dependent on the reader's response to metaphor and allusion and verbal texture as Proust's great novel. Yet for those to whom A la recherche is merely a student's task A Reading of Proust will be useful and informative, and for others Fowlie's exposition may provide a bridge to that point where the novel itself will take life in their imaginations in a way that even the best guidebook could not have led them to expect. For the real understanding of any work of art involves a communication between observer and artist which is direct and in every case unique.

But Fowlie is too deeply immersed in his subject to leave A Reading of Proust as a mere literary guide; the incidental judgments he makes regarding Proust both widen the scope of his survey and diminish its objectivity. Most obvious is his attempt to place Proust in the hierarchy of modern French writers. Here Fowlie reveals himself as the ardent admirer, anxious at all costs to present his subject in the most flattering light. He sees Proust as the semblable of the great Baudelaire, "the most universal French writer of the 19th century," and seeks to establish parallels by illogical comparisons of this kind: "Baudelaire transformed his experience of evil (mal) into flowers (fleurs), and Proust resurrected his past life (temps perdu) and reconstructed it in a novel (temps retrouvé)." All that Fowlie actually tells us in this confused statement is that Baudelaire and Proust, like all artists, transmuted actuality as they saw it into forms of art, but he deludes himself into imagining that he has indicated a special correspondence between the two writers which in some way enhances Proust's stature. On just as shaky foundations, he also presents Proust as the heir of Balzac.

Nor does Fowlie stop at finding close affinities between Proust and the other French writers he admires most. He has wider claims to make. "Proust," he tells us, "is unquestionably the most widely read and admired French writer of the 20th [century]." In my experience, for every one person who has read and admired Proust at least three have read and admired Camus, but the point is surely irrelevant, since even more people have read and admired Simenon. Popularity, even after a generation, is no criterion of excellence. But Fowlie is full of the anxiety of the true believer, and urgently grabs our sleeves as he assures us that "today Proust even more than Gide seems to be the great liberator from convention by his faithful and relentless depiction of it." Proust would have been amused to hear such didactic triumphs accorded to him, but again the statement is irrelevant to the discussion of Proust as a literary artist or to the kind of judgment we should make of him.

There are points in A Reading of Proust where one begins to suspect that Fowlie does not even understand some of the most obvious statements of his hero, so blinded

HOUSTON CHRONICLE 9/20/64

Bigotry Charged In Iron Firm, Union

BY BOB TUTT
Chronicle Reporter

Agents of the National Labor Relations Board regional office are investigating charges that Cameron Iron Works, Inc., and a union have discriminated against Negro employes.

The charges were filed in behalf of 69 Negro workers who allege there is discrimination with respect to job training and classifications, advancements, rates of pay, transfers and other conditions of employment "because of racial considerations."

Lodge 12, Dist. 37, International Assn. of Machinists, represents about 1600 production and maintenance workers at Cameron's large steel products and oil tool manufacturing plant, Katy Rd. at Silber. Roughly 200 of these workers are Negroes.

Both Cameron and the union deny any discrimination.

The Negroes charge that the company has failed to bargain in good faith with the union because equal treatment allegedly has not been guaranteed for all workers.

The union is accused of causing Cameron to discriminate against Negoes and of failing to represent all the workers fairly and impartially.

After the regional NLRB office completes its investigation the findings will be forwarded to the NLRB's general counsel in Washington, who will decide whether the evidence merits prosecuting the case against Cameron and the machinist union.

John B. Ogden, Cameron vice-president and manager of industrial relations, said, "Our position is that there has not been any discrimination, but I can't speak further until the charges, which are stated in very general terms, are made more specific."

Representatives of the presidential committee on equal employment opportunities have inspected Cameron's work practices and been satisfied there was no discrimination, Ogden said.

Fair employment practices are required of companies holding government contracts such as Cameron.

Selection of workers for training programs and promotions is strictly on the basis of qualifications, not race, Ogden said.

Johnny C. Hampton, business agent for IAM Dist. 37, also maintained that the union gives fair representation to all workers, regardless of race.

James A. Kennedy, a general laborer at Cameron, signed the charges in behalf of the group of Negroes.

He said the purpose of the action was not, as in the recent case of Hughes Tool Co., to get a union removed as bargaining agent, but only to get what he described as equal job opportunities for Negro workers.

tunities for Negro workers.

Labor Hits 'Myths' on Civil Rights Law

WASHINGTON (PAI)—A grass-roots program to counter unfounded myths about the new Civil Rights Law and to secure voluntary compliance with its actual provisions has been launched by the AFL-CIO.

Some 300 delegates from international unions and state and local central bodies attending a National Civil Rights Conference here gave their enthusiastic approval of the plan. Exec. Vice-Pres. Alex Bail represented the RWDSU at the conference.

Two of the worst distortions of the law, countered by most speakers, involved employment. The facts are that:

- The Civil Rights Act in no way affects the seniority system and will not take away anyone's job, and
- The law will not give preferential treatment to Negroes or to anyone else.

"The fears expressed about the Fair Employment section of the act are proving groundless," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared. He stressed that what the AFL-CIO seeks and the law provides is equal and fair treatment of all citizens.

He warned that those who seek to distort the law, those who fight it at every turn, have historically fought trade unionism and the rights of the workingman.

"Many members of White Citizens Councils," Meany said, "have been associated with 'right-to-work' drives and they work through business organizations to entice runaway industry from the North to the South, promising an abundant supply of cheap labor."

The AFL-CIO leader outlined five steps the AFL-CIO will take to bring about "peaceful compliance" with the law:

1. Each international union will make available one member or officer to work with local central bodies.
2. Each international union will assign one officer to head a civil rights unit which will, among its other activities, work to incorporate non-discrimination clauses in contracts.
3. Each local and state central body will set up a similar committee.
4. The National AFL-CIO will set up a committee to help non-union workers faced with job discrimination.
5. Area conferences on civil rights and human rights will be held.

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept., under Dir. Don Slaiman, has prepared a manual "to provide meaningful guidelines for affirmative action" in the civil rights field by local and international unions as well as state and local central bodies.

Meany said that although the FEP sections of the Civil Rights Bill will not go into effect until 1965, "we don't wait until next year."

Two conference speakers warmly praised the labor movement for its leadership in the fight for equal treatment of all citizens—former Florida Gov. LeRoy Collins, director of the Community Relations Service under the Act, and Roy Wilkins of the National Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People.

Collins declared that the AFL-CIO "leadership role has been growing ever-stronger. And I salute you for it. You were among the first who saw clearly the need for action in this area. When President Kennedy called upon the leadership resources of the nation, you were at the forefront, asking what you could do for your country."

Wilkins recounted the NAACP's "fine relationship with union labor, a sort of, you might call, family relationship."

What the New Law Says on Job 'Preference'

WASHINGTON—Answering the charge that white workers would be discharged to make jobs for Negroes, under the new Civil Rights Act, NAACP Exec. Sec. Roy Wilkins read to the AFL-CIO meeting Sec. 703 (j) of the law, as follows:

"Nothing contained in this title shall be interpreted to require any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee subject to this title to grant preferential treatment to any individual or to any group because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin of such individual or group on account of an imbalance which may exist with respect to the total number or percentage of persons of any race, color, religion, sex, or national origin employed by any employer . . . in any community, state, section or other area."

Civil Rights Group Backs Scripto Strike in Atlanta

By VARTANIG G. VARTAN

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Dec. 16—At 6 o'clock this morning, a dozen Negro women appeared at gates of the sprawling block-square Scripto plant here and began picketing in the chill Georgia dawn.

"It's my feet that get cold first," one of the women said. She pointed to white socks she was wearing over her stockings.

Muffled in an array of coats, scarves, slacks and knitted wool caps, the pickets carried placards bearing such slogans as "We're Human Beings — Not Machines" and "We Won't Be Slaves No More."

Thus began the 20th day of a strike against Scripto, Inc., makers of pens and cigarette lighters, by Local 754 of the International Chemical Workers Union.

Some 700 production line workers, all of them Negro women, are on strike. But Scripto's 117 skilled workers, including six Negro men, remain on their jobs. The plant continues to operate under Georgia's right-to-work law.

Started in Negro District

The plant was started in 1923 in a small building in a Negro residential area, and its unskilled workers, who assemble parts in jobs requiring little training, traditionally have been Negro women in the neighborhood.

Some white men and women now have been hired by the company to replace some of the Negro women who walked off their jobs. The strikers received $57.00 a week, on the average, plus some fringe benefits.

For many Negro women, a job at Scripto has been preferable to working as a servant in some Atlanta home for lower pay and longer hours.

The Chemical Workers Union received certification in June to represent Scripto employes. But only Negro women working in unskilled jobs have joined the union.

Meanwhile, contract negotiations are continuing between th union and the company.

An unusual factor in this strike is a strong link forged between the union and the civil rights movement.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., whose Ebenezer Baptist Church stands only two blocks from the Scripto plant, has set into motion a nationwide boycott of Scripto products by his civil rights organization.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. King, is distributing handbills saying "Don't buy Scripto products."

The handbills picture a Santa Claus with tears running down into his beard.

Thanksgiving Day Vote

Dr. King, who accepted the Nobel Peace Prize in Oslo last week on behalf of the civil rights movement, is not expected to return to Atlanta until next Monday.

Meanwhile, some members of his church are marching with the Scripto pickets.

Union members voted to strike on Thanksgiving Day. They began picket duties the next day, Nov. 27, at the red brick Scripto plant, a mile and a half east of Atlanta's business district.

The two major obstacles to a contract were wages and the union's insistence for a dues checkoff, under which the company would collect dues for the union.

Management takes the view that the dispute is essentially a matter of economics.

"Another issue—that of racial discrimination—was injected by the union after the strike was called," says James V. Carmicael, 54 years old, chairman of Scripto.

Jerry Levine, 34, the union's special representative, counters by saying, "We feel the wage offer discriminates against the Negro employe."

He is a short, earnest man who grew up in Brooklyn and has worked for unions in the South for the last 10 years.

Both men are heavy cigarette smokers. Mr. Carmicael lights up with a Scripto Vu-Lighter that shows when the fuel is low. Mr. Levine uses book matches.

"Some mornings we have choral groups out here," says Mr. Levine. "We sing union and freedom songs like 'We Shall Not Be Moved,' and 'We Shall Overcome.'"

In the daytime the aroma of baking berad, from a nearby bakery, hangs over the Scripto plant.

Around the plant are parked automobiles filled with Negro women who relieve the pickets at intervals. The heaters keep going in the autos and when the door opens a radio plays "Tis the Season to Be Jolly."

The strike has frayed tempers thin and some Scripto employes still on the job have received telephone threats. One applicant for a job reportedly was beaten and robbed of her $189 wig.

"I think the company can withstand the strike and the boycott," says Mr. Carmicael. "But I am concerned over the situation which is dividing the Negro community."

Scripto's profits have been declining in the last two years. The company cites increased labor costs and the highly competitive nature of its business.

One of Scripto's directors is Douglas Fairbanks Jr., the movie and television performer who also has extensive business interests.

Any future alliance between civil rights organizations and labor unions may hinge upon the outcome of the Scripto situation.

The union and the rights conference say they have reached a "working agreement." The union approached the civil rights organization.

In a television interview here on Dec. 4, in commenting on the Scripto strike, Dr. King told a reporter:

"We have decided that now is the time to identify our movement very closely with labor."

"Can we then assume that this is only the first?" Dr. King was asked.

"That is right," he replied. "There will be many more to follow."

N.L.R.B. IMPOSES RACIAL PENALTY

Orders Local to Aid Negroes in Grievances at Goodyear

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 — The National Labor Relations Board imposed today the most severe penalty it had set in a case involving a union local found guilty of engaging in racial discrimination.

For the first time, the board ordered a local to propose to an employer contract provisions to prohibit discrimination in terms and conditions of employment, and further to bargain in good faith to obtain them.

The 3-to-2 board decision involved Local 12 of the United Rubber Workers of America at the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company plant at Gadsden, Ala.

Eight Negro members of the local, aided by Robert L. Carter, general counsel of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, filed charges with the board in 1962 asserting that the local had refused to handle their grievances.

The workers had sought to desegregate company facilities, such as restrooms, a cafeteria and the company golf course. They also sought pay for a period during which they were laid off while white workers with less seniority continued to work.

Despite a ruling by George Burdon, the president of the local's national union, that the grievances should be processed by the local, the local refused.

Unfair Practice Charged

The three-member board majority, made up of Boyd Leedom, Gerald A. Brown and Howard Jenkins Jr., ruled that the local had refused to process the grievances because they were filed by Negroes. This violated the local's duty under the Taft-Hartley Act to represent all employes in the bargaining unit without regard to race and was an unfair labor practice prohibited by the act, the majority held.

Frank W. McCulloch, chairman of the board, and John H. Fanning, a member, dissented. They said that Congress had not made it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to violate its duty of fair representation, as such.

Congress, in the section of the Taft-Hartley Act banning certain unfair labor practices by unions, did not intend that the board police all unfair conduct by a labor organization, the dissenters said.

"On the contrary," they continued, "it intended to subject to the prohibitions of that section only such conduct which is motivated at least in part by union membership considerations, or the operation of some union rule, obligation or authority."

A union that discriminates against Negroes can have its board certification as bargaining agent revoked, they said, but this is not a sufficient basis for finding an unfair labor practice violation.

The board majority noted that Local 12 and the company, under pressure from the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, had verbally agreed in 1962 not to interpret their labor contract in such a way as to result in racial discrimination.

But the majority concluded that the local should bargain to achieve written antidiscrimination provisions because of its long history of "invalid interpretations of contracts" in a racially discriminatory way, its failure in 1962 to reach more than a verbal agreement with the company and its "continuing resistance to its duty of fair representation."

The majority also ordered the local to process the grievances on which the initial charges were made.

The board orders may be appealed to the United States Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court. If upheld, they may be enforced by the appeals court on pain of a possible contempt finding.

Thus, the board's action in today's case is potentially a more direct remedy than simply revoking Local 12's certification would have been.

Major Significance Found

Robert L. Carter, general counsel of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said that the N.L.R.B. decision was of major significance in the effort of Negroes to obtain equal job opportunities.

"The decision," he said, "makes the union's refusal to process a grievance concerning the Negro members' complaint as to discrimination and unequal treatment in respect to terms and conditions of employment an unfair labor practice.

"Moreover, it reads the act as placing an affirmative duty on the union to fairly represent all workers in the bargaining unit, including its own Negro members. It has no discretion to act or refuse to act where the terms and conditions of employment are affected by racial considerations."

Mr. Carter, who represented the Negro workers in the case, expressed the view that Negroes generally now had "a formidable weapon" with which to protect themselves against discrimination by unions certified under the National Labor Relations Board.

REMEMBER THE NEEDIEST!

Three Issues Jell In Scripto Strike

Protocol, racial discrimination and wages emerged as the issues in the strike against Scripto, Inc., Saturday as Local 574 of the International Chemicals Workers Union continued their walkout for the second day.

The local called the strike Thursday after employes unanimously rejected a company contract offer the union termed "Racially discriminatory."

The contract called for 2 per cent raise for unskilled workers and a 4 per cent raise for skilled workers. Of the company's 900 employes, 700 are Negro, and only five or six are classified as skilled.

Meanwhile, Dr. Martin Luther King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Council, said he would call for a boycott of Scripto products "if something isn't done to rectify the unjust conditions."

IN TELEGRAMS to Scripto President J. E. Aderhold and Board Chairman James V. Carmichael, Dr. King said reports from Negro workers at Scripto "have me greatly distressed."

He said he affirmed his full support of the striking employes and pledged the support of "our entire organization in the event that any of them are fired or otherwise intimidated in their quest to bargain collectively."

The Negro leader then said that if something isn't done, "I will have no alternatives but to call upon all of our supporters and people of good will over the nation to wtihdraw their eco-supprt from Scripto products."

THE STRIKE started Friday and was termed 85 per cent effective, according to union spokesmen. They said that even more persons stayed away from work Saturday.

In a release Saturday Scripto said that "Production continues slower than normal, but is improving hourly." Supervisory personnel are working on the production lines alongside the workers who reported.

The union has said it will continue the strike until "We get a decent union contract," but emphasized that "We have a standing offer to meet with the company any time."

SCRIPTO takes the position that it has made a "complete proposal" and is waiting to hear from the union. The union says that the proposal was rejected Thursday, and the company should make new recommendations.

The company also said that it "regrets that a charge of racial bias has been made." It rejected the charge as not true, and continued "The company has a record of being a leader in the area of race relations of which it is and has a right to be proud."

Scripto's release further noted that "Numerous threats are being made to our employes," and asked that any such incidents be reported to the company.

The union denied instigating any incidents, and said that it is unaware of any.

Local 574 has been representing Scripto employes in the three Houston Street plants since November, 1963. Contract negotiations have been under way since last June. Workers are not members of the union legally until the contract is negotiated.

RACE BIAS CITED IN SCRIPTO STRIKE

By KELLY MANSFIELD

A strike of employes at the Scripto Inc. plant in Atlanta with the union charging discriminatory practices against Negro workers began Friday. The strike was called by Local 574 of the International Chemical Workers Union.

Picket lines were established at 6 a.m., an hour before the first shift was to report. Union officials said the strike was "about 85 per cent successful."

The company employs about 900 workers.

J. E. ADERHOLD, general manager of the company, said at noon Friday, "We are in production and I hope it is going to continue to improve."

The union won bargaining rights for employes at the company in a National Labor Relations Board election in September, 1963.

A union spokesman said negotiations for a contract began in June, 1964 and have not resulted in an acceptable contract with the company.

The spokesman said more than 700 of the 900 employes at the plant were Negroes. However, he said, only about six of the Negroes were classified as "skilled" workers. The large majority of the Negro employes, he continued, earned about $1.25 per hour.

THE COMPANY has offered a pay raise of 2 per cent to nonskilled workers and a raise of 4 per cent to skilled workers, the spokesman said. Thus, he continued, the raise proposals were discriminatory against the Negro employes as a group.

He said Scripto officials "made it quite clear" that the raises would be granted only at the expense of Christmas bonuses the following year. Thus, he said, "the offer was only a transfer of funds for the Christmas bonus of 1965 and spreading it out over the entire year."

ANOTHER contention, he continued, was that the company had refused a voluntary deduction of dues from the employes' paychecks.

Mr. Aderhold said, "Scripto is ready and willing to continue negotiations in an effort to arrive at an agreement which is fair to both the employes and the company and the union has been so informed.

"Scripto has a job to do and obligations to meet. Therefore the company's production of merchandise will continue. All three shifts will be operated on schedule and all employes reporting to work will find work to do.

"Further statements will be made when the situation requires them. At the present time, there is no further comment."

A DELEGATION of nine persons, men and women members of the union, called on Mayor Ivan Allen at 10 a.m. Friday for the purpose of expressing their wish to reach an agreement on the strike.

Mayor Allen said the union members wanted him to be "conversant" with the problems they are confronted with.

The mayor said the group also wanted to thank the city for the orderly way in which the city police have handled picket lines at the plant.

Mayor Allen said, "I would like to see all strikes concluded here and all persons gainfully employed and all firms actively engaged in earning a profit.

He urged both workers and management to attempt to reach an agreement as soon as possible.

MORE RECRUITING URGED ON UNIONS

Labor Leader Warns of Federal Regulations

By EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

A top labor official warned construction unions yesterday to widen their apprentice training programs or face Government regulation of their membership policies.

The warning came from Peter T. Schoemann, general president of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States. He said that in the last several years "we have fallen down on the job" of apprenticeship and training to meet the industry's needs.

Mr. Schoemann, speaking at the seventh annual convention of the New York State Building and Construction Trades Council in the Commodore Hotel, called attention to recent Federal legislation appropriating funds for training apprentices as part of the President's anti-poverty program.

"The big danger is that with all that money flowing around," he said, "and so many agencies in on the act, they're going to look for ways and means of spending it, telling us that we ought to be training five times as many people as we are, and that if we don't do it, the Govment will have to seek other means of doing it."

Although Mr. Schoemann made no reference to exclusion by some of these unions of Negroes, the construction unions have been criticized over alleged discrimination against nonwhites in recruiting members.

Urged to Recruit Negroes

Another speaker, Harry Van Arsdale Jr., president of the New York City Central Labor Council, also called on the unions to recruit more Negroes.

Mr. Van Arsdale, who is a member of the President's Community Service Committee, a group trying to inprove job opportunities for Negroes, said he was making the appeal to the construction unions as a member of that committee.

"We may have overlooked the fact that we can strengthen our unions by admitting more Negroes," he said. "I don't know of unions that do discriminate, but if Negroes feel that they are being excluded, it's our responsibility to improve their opportunities. I think it's time we did something about the problem."

Mr. Van Arsdale also urged that efforts to increase voter registration be intensified. He said most of those who did not vote were of the lower-income groups. He stressed these potential voters would oppose Senator Barry Goldwater, whom he described as "a very reckless fellow" and an enemy of organized labor.

Another speaker who urged increased union membership for Negroes was Walter Colleran, lawyer for the council. Mr. Colleran said that although many of the construction unions had Negroes there were "some pockets" among them that had none.

"Changes are going to have to be made," he said. "Unions without Negroes will have to admit some. It will be a good thing for all of us when this happens."

VIRGINIA GOVERNOR TO VETO JOB CORPS

YORKTOWN, Va., Aug. 29 (UPI)—Gov. Albertis S. Harrison Jr. assured residents of this historic community today that he would veto any local antipoverty project not acceptable to them.

Russell Carneal, a Virginia legislator, met with the Governor at nearby colonial Williamsburg to discuss the furor that has developed since the Federal Government announced it wanted to set up a job corps camp in a national park here.

"I will veto any part of this program where the local community objects," the Governor said.

"Then I'd say the outlook for having a camp in York County is dim," Mr. Carneal declared.

Residents of Yorktown, where the last battle of the American Revolution was fought, fear impoverished youths, including Negroes, brought into the camp would roam the community when their day's work was done.

Sargent Shriver, director of the Peace Corps, was advised of objections by local residents. He said they were "grossly misinformed about the job corps.

"Job corps camps will not be composed of all Negroes or all Spanish-speaking Americans, or of all rural white or of all anything else," he said, adding:

"Every member will be carefully screened and will be the kind of American that could be welcomed in the United States. Every boy will be supervised, trained, and counselled by some of the most talented men from the National Park Service, the Forest Service, the Bureau of Indian Affairs and similar agencies."

Racist Closes Restaurant

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Aug. 29 (UPI) — James H. Whitson, a local restaurant owner, has closed his business in preference to serving Negro as well as white customers. He explained that he thinks the government has no right to tell him whom he must serve. The city had a public accommodations ordinance in effect 10 months before Congress enacted the Federal Civil Rights Act. A case is pending in the Kentucky Court of Appeals against Mr. Whitson, charging him with violation of the city ordinance.

This is an effort to tell of the progress Charlotte has made in race relations. It is confined to the accounts and views of those who participated in the progress, the leaders and people of Charlotte. In brief, these people tell what happened, how it happened, why it happened, what the situation is now, and what is the outlook for the future. How the people directly involved view these things seems to us an important dimension of what actually has and will take place.

The City Hall of Charlotte covers a square block on East Trade Street, in an area of the downtown devoted to government buildings (the massive Mecklenburg County Courthouse is on the next square block), an urban renewal project clearing out a Negro slum called Brooklyn which had been regarded for many years as the city's worst, and a few blocks of small businesses, including a fish and oyster market, and pawn shops, one featuring in a window a gold-framed, tinted photograph of the late John F. Kennedy for $7.50. A little farther on, beyond a railroad overpass, East Trade joins Tryon Street at the "square," the shopping and business and financial center of the city. Here, the white-glinting Wachovia Bank Building dominates a grouping of old and new skyscrapers which, along with dressed-up windows of the smartest shops, invoke the mood and tempo of the standard American city. (A planning consultant's firm warns that despite its strengths, the downtown needs more attractions, high-rise apartments, better parking to avoid debilitation from surburban shopping center competition.) A fine planting of old and city-blackened trees are on the lawn of the big, concrete city hall, with its massive round columns, and in some of the trees there are bird-houses. One of the first things that stands out when you enter the high-ceilinged, wide-hall main floor of this southern city hall is a young Negro woman among the clerical staff of the Water Department, seated behind the bill-payment counter. (In another government building across the street, a Negro man asks where is the welfare department, facing a sign, "Entrance--Welfare Department.")

It is here amid the typical trappings of the seat of municipal political power, including the grimly painted police department with its grisly display of burglar tools in a glass case, and the pastel-tinted, sunshine-lit offices of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Education Department, that a study like this begins. From here, like the dozen of intersecting and right angling streets that form patterns and squares and rectangles off the main arteries of downtown, the story moves out of the city. It moves to the big office buildings, the offices of Negro professionals the fashionable homes of civic leaders, a noise-surrounded slum, the city rooms of newspapers, with tempting sidetrails off into the legend of Daddy Grace and W. J. Cash, and into the living legend of the cluttered office of Harry Golden, into banks, stores, restaurants, the omnipotent Chamber of Commerce, Negro funeral homes, churches, all of these interconnected and influencing one another, like criss-crossings of streets.

On the second floor of City Hall in an old-fashioned office with modern design furniture, Mayor Stan R. Brookshire, dapper in a business suit and richly polished loafers, a man of medium height with graying blond hair, heavy-rim glasses tinted faintly blue, talked easily, genially, carefully.

It was, he said, a combination of "social consciousness, civic pride, and economic considerations" which moved Charlotte in the Spring and early Summer of 1963 to desegregate voluntarily its leading hotels and motels, "90% of its restaurants," and its first class movie theatres.

(Previously, the city had desegregated its auditorium and coliseum, lunch counters, its schools, library, buses, bus drivers, police department, parks and their swimming pools, community services, Medical Association, to some extent its colleges and hospitals, and its ministerial association.)

Mayor Brookshire told of how a new wave of demonstrations in the Spring of 1963 was sweeping through other North Carolina cities, "terrifically embarrassing those cities," and how negotiations were underway on desegregation of Charlotte's public accommodations. Owners were all "a little afraid to move independently," fearing economic repercussions. Then he recalled the proud story, familiar to all Charlotte, of what happened next.

The mayor and J. Ed Burnside, Sr., wealthy small-loans financier, then president of the 4,500 member, vigorous Charlotte Chamber of Commerce, had a talk on Sunday, May 19.

They agreed to call the Executive Committee of the Chamber together to see what could be done about the danger of a demonstration crisis. Eleven of the 15 members of the committee were present for the meeting. Mr. Burnside asked what they thought should be done. A motion was made and passed unanimously, and the next day the Chamber's board of directors, 24 of the 39 members, was confronted with a one-sentence resolution: "We, the directors of the Charlotte Chamber of Commerce, recommend that all business in this community catering to the general public be opened immediately to all customers without regard to race, creed or color." It was passed unanimously. Expression of dissent was encouraged; none came.

Then there were meetings with the owners of the segregated accommodations. "We wanted them to know that the business leadership of this community felt that this was the right thing to do," Chamber Executive Vice President Charles Crawford was quoted as saying, in a behind-the-scenes story in the Charlotte Observer by City Editor L. M. Wright, Jr.

Desegregation followed: first, the hotels and motels; then the restaurants; then the theatres. Reluctance of many restaurant owners was overcome when one of them suggested that the Chamber officials bring the first Negroes to lunch or dinner as guests in a staged "trial" desegregation. This was done, with arrangements for these public appearances made by the Mayor's Community Relations Committee, a bi-racial organization to improve race relations. White and Negro leaders who participated in these impressive, staged desegregation dinners recalled them with pride, and a certain amount of awe. "A few people glanced up, then went on eating. There was no trouble," said Mr. Burnside of his party's entrance into a hotel dining room.

The mayor's Committee also organized test attendance by selected Negroes for the first desegregation of movies. For some reason, there was a good deal of concern built up in Charlotte over the emotional impact of Negroes being seated there in the dark of the movie theatres, a fear that in this city, which had already desegregated its swimming pools without incident, white reaction would be strong. It failed to materialize. "We saw a lot of terrible movies," said a Negro who participated.

Mr. Wright's story summed up the situation thus: "Charlotte chose a different way. In Birmingham, hundreds were marching in the streets. Closer to home, protesters sat all day in the mayor's office in Greensboro, and were carried out by police when the time came to close the office for the day. In Raleigh and Durham they marched, and they were arrested. In Wilmington, in Fayetteville, in Lexington, they protested. But Charlotte chose a different way..."

That Mayor Brookshire played a key role in what happened and in creating a climate in which it might happen is generally agreed upon in Charlotte. The turning point for Charlotte, according to Charles M. Lowe, another prominent businessman who is chairman of the county commission, began at a meeting of the Chamber's Executive Board "six or seven years ago." Mr. Lowe, active in the Charlotte Council on Human Relations and considered a liberal on race, had received permission to appeal to members of the Executive Board for merit employment. He said he knew that privately all there agreed with him. But Mr. Brookshire, a sales engineer who grew up in the small North Carolina town of Troutman, was the only man there who got up and said so publicly. So when Mr. Brookshire was elected mayor, said Mr. Lowe, and with his friend Ed Burnside at the head of the Chamber, he felt assured of good things for Charlotte.

"The mayor and Burnside did it," said Mr. Lowe, "People thought they were such fine men they would not lead them astray."

Mayor Brookshire handed over a story about his receiving the silver medallion of the National Conference of Christians and Jews on 1964 Brotherhood Day. It told of his gradual realization after the Supreme Court decision on schools that racial discrimination was unchristian and unjust. Mayor Brookshire cited the circumstances of his election for a first term in 1961 as an important key to what he has been able to achieve. He did not receive the support of the majority of Negro voters. This went instead to a woman candidate, Mrs. Martha Evans, who had long been outspoken in support of liberal causes, including Negro concerns. Mr. Brookshire, who had been chairman of the United Appeal in 1956, head of United Community Services in 1957, president of the Chamber in 1960, was an accepted part of the business "power structure." He conceded that his decision to run in 1960 had "tie ins" with businessmen's doubts about other candidates, including Mrs. Evans.

The lack of Negro support, he said, enabled him to act on race relations without unfair political interpretations. He had "no commitments" to the Negro vote; he could act "in the best interests of all citizens."

The second time he ran, in the Spring of 1963, he had the Negro vote. Probably one of the most revealing facts about Charlotte's general frame of mind is that, despite Mr. Brookshire's record on race, and despite the fact that the build-up to a showdown on public accommodations had begun, race was not an issue, was not mentioned during the campaigning.

The astonishing and heartening reaction to the desegregation breakthrough was described by Mayor Brookshire. (He pointed out -- and all others agreed -- that there is no organized segregationist movement in Charlotte and no vocal segregationist leader.) There were only a few local telephone calls and letters of protest. There was national acclaim, even international, with radio Free Europe and Voice of America doing special programs on the achievement, and write-ups in national magazines. Conventions have increased, and new industries have come in, as a result of the action, he said and, most importantly, the people of Charlotte responded with cooperation and pride.

Things, he said, have worked out splendidly at the desegregated facilities. There is a general feeling that Negroes wanted the rights more than they wanted to take advantage of using them. There had been recently, in February 1964, trouble at a few restaurants still holding out. The most notable of these were high-toned, supper clubbish places, nine in all, and all with Greek owners. There were various theories in Charlotte as to reasons for their reluctance, including one that they feared resultant prejudice against themselves. City Editor Wright in an interview said most had been about to go along in 1963, but they had got together at a Greek wedding on the weekend before a decision had to be made, and among themselves agreed to hold out. A sit-in had occurred in February at a recently opened place, the House of Beef. When the owner turned the sit-ins away, all his Negro help quietly walked out. Mayor Brookshire expressed confidence it would all be cleared up through communication. "If we can keep the confidence of one another," he said, "we are in good position to handle problems intelligently, a good position for racial accord."

The likeliest future trouble spots, he said, will be in contacts among individuals. "People get excited." (A cursory reading of news stories over the past ten years shows an occasional burst of raw violence among individual Negroes and whites in Charlotte -- fist fights, rock throwing, even shootings. These seem isolated, unconnected with any desegregation development of the moment.)

"Our Negroes," Mayor Brookshire also said, "in Charlotte take considerable pride in their own race... They prefer their own churches. There is no effort to cross to white churches... They have some fine neighborhoods, and are anxious to preserve their quality."

On jobs, the mayor said, there are "more doors of opportunity open on merit basis than we can find Negro applicants for." Utilities, banks, the governments, he said, were actively seeking qualified Negro clerical help. He spoke with pride of Negro police and of the Negro employe of the water department "in plain view."

He talked of the Mayor's Community Relations Committee as the largest factor in continued good race relations. When he came into the office, there was a mayor's Friendly Relations Committee, appointed by his predecessor during the original sit-ins of 1960. It had been dormant since then, and, in Mayor Brookshire's terms, was largely a thing "to put out fires." He "reconstructed" it for "productive efforts to correct causes of trouble."

Asked what the city had learned from its experience with such a committee, Mayor Brookshire said the most important lesson had been the necessity that all negotiations be in good faith. There has to be "understanding, good will, and cooperation." This can create the necessary climate in which progress can "be made, accepted, and supported." The other important thing learned, he said, is that race relations is a matter of dealing with people. "When Negroes approach with militancy and threats, it is a matter of saying to them: 'Look, we can't fight and cooperate... Which do you want to do?'"

Behind all the recent progress, the mayor said, has been the previous record of the city. "We got past many problems early that are still bothering other communities."

Why? "It is probably just a willingness of this community to be more progressive, to accede to reasonable requests," said Mayor Brookshire. At another point, he conceded that "to be basically honest," he would have to say that the city had not moved on any recent racial progress "without threat."

What of the future? The mayor handed over two of his recent speeches. The following quotations from them typify the spirit and the approach of the mayor of Charlotte:

> Two hundred new manufacturing concerns, 900 new retail and service outlets and 450 new wholesale firms, together with growth and expansion of old firms, have provided 55,000 new jobs in Charlotte which we did not have 15 years ago.
> Total employment in Charlotte now stands at 135,000, producing an annual payroll of more than 400 million dollars. It is interesting to note that 17,000 people from surrounding counties commute to Charlotte to work...
> Charlotte's retail business comes to 350 million dollars per year and our wholesale sales exceed two billion dollars annually, representing an increase of 75% during the past 15 years... More than 36,000 new dwelling units have been built in Charlotte in the past 15 years.
> Charlotte is a regional city, populous, prosperous, and progressive, with a proud past and a promising future, enhanced by the trend towards urbanization, occupying a strategic geographic position almost in the center of the two Carolinas, midway between the mountains and the seashore, and equa-distant between Richmond and Atlanta... At our present explosive growth rate we should have near one-half million by 1980, and perhaps a million by the end of the century...
> The current movement of Negroes to secure equal citizenship rights and opportunities is just, and by the same token, discrimination based on ethnic differences is wrong -- both morally and legally...
> Although current racial problems are national in scope, each and every community must face them and seek to find its own solutions...

The best approach is through bi-racial cooperation, with an involvement of total leadership, both white and Negro...

Progress is limited to the speed with which attitudes can be changed and voluntary cooperation can be gained...

The overall problem of racial conflict can be converted to an opportunity of raising the level of citizenship and building better communities, by making more of our citizens self-respecting, self-supporting and responsible members of society, thereby attacking many of our civic problems of poverty, slums and crimes...

Many hundreds of community agencies in Charlotte, most prominent of which is our Chamber of Commerce, through strong leadership, are making contributions to the on-going of our city and region.

Tangible efforts to build a better city, and to meet the challenges of both present and future, can be seen in our programs of slum clearance, zoning, thoroughfare planning, expansion of city services, fiscal matters, race relations, and our attack on crime, delinquency and poverty.

(The mayor also handed over a copy of the Declaration of Independence of Mecklenburg County. It is dated May 20, 1775, a year before the one of all the colonies. Historians argue over its authenticity, but there seems to be no question at all that Charlotte is the place called by Lord Cornwallis during the Revolutionary War "a damned hornet's nest of insurrection." The Charlotte of the past immortalized this in its city seal, fastidiously omitting the "damned." Such local hall marks of American antiquity seem entirely left out of the consciousness of the new Charlotte with its glass and brick skyscrapers, its regional headquarters and financial centers, and its movement of industry toward chemistry and computers. The ancient cemetery of the First Presbyterian Church occupies a square block in the center of the business district, but many of its old headstones are toppled and broken. The church, built in 1832, rebuilt in 1894, occupies the adjoining square block, sending a thin spire fragilely up among the skyscrapers. The first settlers came in 1748; "Charlotte town" was chartered in 1768; it knew a gold rush in the 1890's, with a federal mint established (now an art museum); it knew plantations before the Civil War, the last meeting of Jefferson Davis's Confederate Cabinet, and cotton mills as its main industry until relatively recently.

Like nearly everyone in Charlotte, Mayor Brookshire had his own version of the immediate events leading up to the big desegregation breakthrough in 1963. (Everyone agreed on what happened in public. Disagreement was on such matters as motive.)

Said Mayor Brookshire: through the Mayor's Committee there had been a tentative agreement in early Spring of 1963 for desegregation of hotels and motels during the International Trade Fair (another of the civic feathers Charlotte had plucked for its hat). But when the fair was over, things reverted to segregation as usual. Negroes, mainly the student protest movement at Johnson C. Smith University, were threatening to picket. But "there was not a single demonstration in Charlotte last year." The only thing approaching one was the holding of services on May 20 by Negroes at the courthouse in honor of Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Day. Not it, but the pressure and the events across the rest of the South prompted the action by the Chamber of Commerce.

Many things about Charlotte's past, present and future can be seen by comparing the mayor's version of 1963 with that of Dr. Reginald A. Hawkins, a Negro dentist and ordained Presbyterian minister. The name of Dr. Hawkins inevitably comes up in a discussion of Charlotte race relations. He is either condemned as a hot-head (and highly effective) stirrer of trouble, or praised as the most effective of Negro leaders, responsible for most progress. Interestingly, the praise more often comes from white liberals than Negro leaders.

Here is how Dr. Hawkins, in an office of his modern glass brick clinic across town (with stylized African glass statuary on the waiting room walls), recalled the same events described by Mayor Brookshire.

Hotels, the mayor, the Chamber of Commerce and others were asked by the Negroes before the 1963 Trade Fair began to consider desegregation. They gave a "wavering response."

In April, there was a "dry run" on the Johnson C. Smith campus of a demonstration for possible staging during the fair to embarrass the many national and foreign dignitaries expected. Governor Sanford, said Dr. Hawkins, asked for a delay of the demonstration; "he felt he could get the power structure to move." So, Dr. Hawkins said, he went before the students and asked them to delay a demonstration planned for a Saturday a week before the Trade Fair was to open. He said he gave the city leaders an ultimatum that the demonstration would occur the following Saturday unless desegregation occurred by Thursday. Eight hotels and motels, he said, agreed but they wanted anonymity. They were tested during the Trade Fair, but nearly all, he said, denied being desegregated.

Plans were underway to attempt to swear out warrants under an old innkeeper's law of North Carolina requiring service by hotels to all seeking it. Then came Birmingham, and, in the midst of its atmosphere, the March on the Declaration of Independence Day (May 20). Dr. Hawkins said that at the time, city leaders were "threatened" with a march of 10,000 later in the month when Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. would be in the city to speak at the Johnson C. Smith Commencement, unless desegregation had occurred by then. He also claimed that the Chamber of Commerce resolution had been written before May 20, with his participation in drawing it up.

"They are lying when they say that they did it all on their own," he declared. He said "they" were angry about being forced to act, until praise from the rest of the country poured in. "Then they dehumanized me -- said they did it in spite of me."

He also said: "Everything that's been done, I've had a hand in forcing... everything that they praise themselves for. They give no credit to me. It's the old pattern of dehumanization."

Dr. Hawkins said he considered his civil rights work in Charlotte a mission of his ministry and expressed the hope that by the time he is 50, in 14 years, he can be retired from both dentistry and civil rights and become an overseas missionary, perhaps in Africa or Latin America.

A native of Charlotte, he graduated from Johnson C. Smith, and went on to Howard College for the D.D.S. degree. He served in World War II and the Korean War, and during this military experience -- partly out of the influence of a Jewish roommate who used to discuss religion with him -- came his strong turn to religion. He went back to Johnson C. Smith and earned a Bachelor of Divinity degree. He is active in Presbyterian Church work, including its regional race relations organization. He also holds an honorary LL.D. from Johnson C. Smith.

"We will keep at it in Charlotte," Dr. Hawkins said, "until we get an open society. This is the human approach; it includes all the people. They [the white leaders] don't like to be coerced, but they are happy afterward. Then there is reconciliation." He also said: "I was the first ever to challenge them and beat them. There were vicious reprisals... But now they are coming around because I've built up political power." He said he had organized enough Negro voters to "swing any election."*

Dr. Hawkins conceded that in the recent past "we have had success in Charlotte. We can tell of breakthroughs in every area..."

He said that he had used "administrative procedures" to force desegregation, as far as it had gotten, at Memorial Hospital through pressure from the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

He said he had protested voter registration hours, including none at night or on Sundays and holidays, and what he termed the firing of registrars he had gotten to take registration on holidays. He said he had caused an FBI investigation of such charges and of another that several thousand Negroes had been dropped from the voting lists because letters delivered to their registered address had been returned, they having moved elsewhere in the city. He said he had filed a suit to desegregate the local Dental Society, not winning the suit but forcing the society to give up appointive powers to state boards.

*According to May 1964 estimates, there are approximately 15,000 Negro voters in Mecklenburg County, equalling about 15% of the total electorate.

He said he had warned against establishment of two segregated city colleges; the previously all-white one is now desegregated and the Negro one down to 66 day students. And he said he has written housing officials concerning desegregation of public housing.

The problems, he said, are all interwoven. In politics, schools, housing, hospitals, the YMCA, even professional societies, the people he has to deal with are the same.

Charlotte, Dr. Hawkins said, is presently a dangerous city, "more immoral than Birmingham." He said breakthrough come under pressure only, and then it's back to business as usual. Like the others, he listed as major problems, unemployment, housing, and schools.

Charlotte, he said, is as ripe for a campaign against tokenism as were Atlanta and Chapel Hill, scenes of protest demonstrations at the time of the interview. "We don't want," he said, "these other cities like Jackson, Birmingham and the cities in eastern North Carolina to become like this one."

His understanding of the mood of the white community was that it would budge no more in any area unless forced by him.

Then he outlined his "new approach" for making the white community budge. He said it was through the "administrative procedure" approach he had used on hospitals. ("Demonstrations can take many forms, like bringing in the federal government...") He said he had been studying federal government regulations back over 16 years, and he knew which agencies could do what, and had access to them.

A crisis, he said, must be provoked through demonstrations or administrative procedures. "Negotiation first is no good." He pointed to negotiations then underway on the Greek restaurants and an airport motel (on urban renewal land) as a result of the walk-out the previous week of kitchen help at one of the Greek restaurants. He said he engineered that.

"We've never had a demonstration siege here," he said. "And this approach has worked."

He said he didn't expect any violence in Charlotte, because of "mutual respect" of whites and Negroes. "They know I'm not violent... If we keep moving, there'll be no violence, but there must be no letting up."

As for the approach of the mayor's bi-racial committee (of which he is not a member): "Other Negro leaders have been won over... City Hall and the power structure want people who will say what they want to hear... They tried it on me -- honors and all. But they haven't come to me with the American Dream -- equal opportunity, the right to vote, respect for my human dignity..."

"I am not satisfied with Charlotte as it is," said Dr. Hawkins. "I will not cooperate with an evil system."

"Woe to them," said Dr. Hawkins, quoting the prophet Amos, "who are at ease in Zion and to those who feel secure in the Mountain of Samaria."

The office of J. Ed Burnside in a new modernistic building which he owns, is quietly splendid, with plenty of shelves and space. One wall is decorated with beautifully done model automobiles, another with plaques and certificates honoring him, including an "Outstanding Community Service Award," and a "Man of the Year" award.

He said that the secret of what had happened in Charlotte was the extraordinary influence of the Chamber of Commerce. "Anything they back goes over."

As outgoing president, he had to appoint 51 committees involving every aspect of governmental and public life in the community. "Of all that I asked to serve as chairman, only one refused and he had a good excuse," said Mr. Burnside. "That's what makes it tick." Through efforts of previous presidents, said Mr. Burnside, the Chamber by the time he became president was the prestige organization of the city.

That's the thing that helped the mayor put it over, he said. "The prestige leaders took a stand."

He recalled that his own preacher, Dr. Carlyle Marney of the powerful Meyers Park Baptist Church, said, after watching the Chamber Board of Directors approve the desegregation resolution, "The Temple has moved downtown."

"He might be right," said Mr. Burnside. He emphasized the unanimity of business leadership in the action. At the executive committee meeting, "I brought up the question. I didn't tell where I stood." One man made the recommendation, the vote was unanimous, and a committee was appointed to draw up the desegregation resolution. It was approved unanimously the next day by the board of directors. "There was not a single vote of dissent. No one even suggested hesitation."

Reaction, he said, was almost universally favorable. Ninety per cent of the City Club membership congratulated him afterward, said it was the best thing he had ever done. (The City Club is the exclusive downtown luncheon club in Charlotte, with its own dining room, complete with a special roped-off "bull-pen" where members who come alone can find luncheon companions.) Hundreds of letters poured in from all over the country. New industries were attracted, including the Eastern Air Lines Computer Center, which -- given federal policies and attitudes -- probably couldn't have been without the race relations breakthrough, he said.

Through it all, though, Mr. Burnside said, it was emphasized that the move was made because it was morally right -- not for economic reasons.

Mr. Burnside echoed Mayor Brookshire in making another point. "I don't believe this is a church problem. It has to be solved downtown." A church, he said, is a group of people who combine because they like each other socially -- and he didn't mean that they are country clubs. In practice, there had been no trouble at Charlotte churches. Negroes had come to services, been seated and didn't return.

He told of attending a discussion with a Negro group, headed, "by a young man named Willie Davis." He was invited as the only white man into a Negro home to discuss race relations with a group of Negroes. "I told them there are many whites who have never seen a Negro Ph.D. There are many instances where white persons have told me, after meeting prominent Charlotte Negroes, "those are as nice people as I have ever seen." He said he went on to tell the Negro group "there is more segregation in your own race than between whites and Negroes..." He told them the story of how he had taken his own Negro chauffeur and yardman to the annual Chamber of Commerce dinner, and how this man had been snubbed by other Negroes ("big shots") at the table. (The Chamber of Commerce is desegregated, he pointed out, with 22 or 23 Negro members "with all privileges.")

Mr. Burnside told how he had been moved to action in behalf of better race relations. He spoke softly: "In Japan, I met a Japanese couple and their son. They wanted him to go to Duke. I agreed to sponsor him. When he got here, I had him over... took him to church with my family. Now his family had killed our American boys in the war, and here I was giving him benefits -- and I wasn't doing anything for the boy who is black..."

As for the future, Mr. Burnside said there is only one agitator in town, and that he has "no more than two per cent" of the Negro population in his following.

Negroes ought to be on the city council and the board of education, he said. One factor that has prevented it is in-fighting among leaders.

The gap between white and Negroes, said J. Ed Burnside, a self-made man, a South Carolinian who has, by his own words, "come a long way," in race relations and material success, can be overcome if all concerned will "shoulder their responsibilities."

"We must carry our part of the load."

The Chamber president who succeeded Mr. Burnside is John Belk, president of Belk Stores, headquartered in Charlotte, and operator of one of its largest department stores. He was less communicative, saying he preferred to be interviewed over the telephone.

He said the only problem in Charlotte was "colored people." In explanation: "The Lord made some white and some colored..."

Basically, he went on, the race problem is an economic problem... "It's like a man and his wife, something that will never get solved." But: "We have some real nice colored gentlemen to work with."

There are a lot of advantages Negroes never had which they deserve, Mr. Belk said. But there are some people who just want to cause trouble. With those not so motivated, he said, "we are willing to work for common goals." He said the Mayor's Committee is the agency "to put things across -- if the people want them..."

He said, too, he had met and talked with the Negro discussion group, from eight until midnight recently. "They think they would like to be white... They've made a lot of headway. But the offended brother is hard to heal... I don't see how he is offended..."

He complained of the many varieties of Negro leaders, mentioning the NAACP and CORE, and expressing relief that Charlotte didn't have as many Communists and "Moslems" as other towns... "We've got the best people in the country..."

He said civil rights had certainly become a big thing. "Politics is on a rat race with it. Education is on a rat race with it. Charity is on a rat race with it. Religion is on a rat race with it. The solution is economic..." He gave charity as an example. "The whites are willing to help. But we'd like the colored race to help too... It takes time..."

Asked about the hope by Charlotte to receive money from the North Carolina Fund, an effort across the state to attack the roots of poverty, Mr. Belk said that the Bible says we will always have poverty. "It can't ever be eliminated." Shouldn't anyone try? "If we give up, we might as well be dead..."

Concern in Charlotte over race, Mr. Belk concluded, is a temporary thing. It will be shifted down. He described as the important things facing his Chamber administration, the development of regional planning for the Charlotte area, and the development of a university in Charlotte as part of the state university system. He discussed them at some length, and spoke also of efforts to bring the Metropolitan Opera to Charlotte for seven days.

In the middle of all Charlotte's race problems (and at the center of most of the interviews) is the Mayor's Committee on Community Relations. Charlotte's first bi-racial council was established during the sit-ins, in March 1960. It was called the Mayor's Friendly Relations Committee. Mayor Brookshire changed its name and the membership and put it on a regular meeting basis, but he did not change the chairman. Having it headed by Dr. John R. Cunningham, distinguished former president of Davidson College, eminently respected and respectable, is considered a master stroke. At the dignified office, in the city's biggest building, of the Presbyterian Foundation, Inc., of which he is executive director, Dr. Cunningham, thin, gray, austerely genial, spoke the language and the accent of refinement which distinguished higher reaches of southern education and religion of a generation ago.

He had only recently moved to Charlotte, on retiring from Davidson after 16 years as president, when he was asked to head the Friendly Relations Committee. "I never dreamed it would be more than the lunch counter thing... It has come to be almost a half-time job... I never dreamed we would be facing up to a revolution."

He said he was very glad Charlotte had responded to the Mayor's foresight as it had. The chief duty of the committee had been to serve as a channel of communication. "A lot of problems are solved by this alone."

A fact sheet, which Dr. Cunningham wrote about the committee, lists 27 members -- one-third Negro, two-thirds white, representative of the population proportions. Members past or present have included, among whites, editors of both papers, a member of City Council, two ministers, two doctors, a Douglas Aircraft official, three churchwomen; and among Negroes, two ministers, a banker, an undertaker, an insurance man, a doctor, a teacher, a professor's wife. (Dr. Cunningham said in the interview that extremists of either race were avoided.)

Subcommittees are on economic opportunities, housing, education, health, and crime... The Committee meets every second Tuesday "in the beautiful Board Room of the Duke Endowment." Dr. Cunningham wrote, "I would emphasize the importance of regular meetings. Even when there is no tension and when we have no special problem before us, we discover that meetings usually result in constructive proposals, reports on conditions locally or elsewhere and so forth. The committee has come to feel a bond of united concern and a warmth of personal relations which are great assets."

The fact sheet also praises Mayor Brookshire for his support, and his speaking and writing about better race relations. "Another very great advantage we have had has been the intelligent support of our two newspapers." It pointed out that at first the committee gave no publicity, but that later, as during the 1963 breakthrough, "it has been decidedly advantageous to be able to announce progress after a limited number of days of experimentation."

(Newspapers generally would chafe at holding off from such a story, even for a limited time to allow experimentation, as the two Charlotte papers did when the Negro and white leaders were dining together to break segregation's ice at the restaurants. Asked about it, Observer City Editor Wright admitted some of his staff were disgruntled; Perry Morgan, managing editor of the News, claimed no one on his paper complained. A television station that tried to cover the event was told that if a camera were at a restaurant, the desegregation teams would not be, and the station would be responsible for blocking progress.)

"At the present time," Dr. Cunningham's fact sheet said, "practically all areas of the city's life are integrated at least in token form. We see no reason to question that, as the months come and go, the barriers of segregation will be gradually and fully removed. We have much to do in strengthening the Negro's position economically, educationally, politically and religiously...

"It is a tribute to the climate of our city and the quality of our citizenship that all these steps have been taken without a single incident of violence or public embarrassment." In the interview, Dr. Cunningham gave as an example of community response a statement by the president of a civic club to which he had described activities of the committee. "I'm from the Delta of Mississippi. But I believe all of what I heard today," the man said.

Dr. Cunningham acknowledged that "nothing is finally, completely desegregated," and that "we must make more progress." He said the committee was working on the situation of the Greek restaurants. "Dr. Hawkins," he said, "furnishes us with splendid ammunition. He threatens and we use it" in negotiations. (Of Dr. Hawkins, Dr. Cunningham said: "He is such a difficult person. He has never recognized our committee in any way, form or fashion....")

Dr. Cunningham described what happened during the 1960 sit-ins. The committee worked from March to July for a breakthrough. The chain stores put it to the leading department stores, Ivy's and Belk's -- saying they would do whatever these local stores did. The two local stores were reluctant. Students met with them to put their position across -- the logic of demanding food where they were served in all other departments. Finally -- and Dr. Cunningham said unexpectedly -- he got a call asking him what would be the best day for the stores to desegregate lunch counters. He named a day.

"That was the beginning... Now in any area, as at a concert, people are used to it... we are not at the point where desegregation gets the ill will of the better citizen. They see what the community has gained the other way. People are over the fear of being called "nigger lover," now. Especially the younger people..."

He said a main problem is helping the Negro help himself and his own race. "They've talked about rights, they must talk about their responsibilities. The Negro doesn't assume responsibility for his own people..."

As did nearly everyone, he listed main problems as education, jobs, housing. Of housing, he said the danger in urban renewal was that in closing out one slum, two or more were created. He described efforts to open jobs, and spoke of the difficulty in communicating opportunities. He told of speaking on the subject on television, and getting a phone call from a Negro job applicant before he left the studio.

As for the future: "What took place here with the Chamber of Commerce and the leadership is a real tribute... to all of them... We would have to have a complete turnabout of the climate of the whole community before the government or business would think in terms of turning back. They were so relieved we did not have a Little Rock or Jackson, that I can't imagine them turning back."

Dr. Cunningham's opinion was that the ministers had been a very strong influence. "Of our 27 members, if one of them is not a dedicated church member, I don't know it."

He handed over a stack of reproductions of all the minutes of committee meetings. They are a study in the slow but steadily effective work of such a group, and of its human processes of talking to one another and of discovery of one another and self, which may be its most important contribution.

"I took this job to serve my community," Dr. Cunningham said, "with some assurances of the support I would get. I've never thought of myself as an extremist. Maybe that's a reason I was asked to take it. I will do all that I think is right, but I hold to the practical. It can't all be done at one meeting or in one month... The committee is completely relaxed. Members can say anything they think. There is a spirit of utter good will..."

In all discussions, the Alexander brothers, Fred and Kelly, are described as important Negro leaders. Fred Alexander, a forceful man of middle age, balding, with heavy topped glasses, a thin moustache, talked late into the night about his city, his own life as the son of a Negro undertaker when few Negroes attained middle class. He talked of his people, and the problems past and future of Charlotte race relations. He is a member of the mayor's committee and a member of the county welfare board -- first Negro named to an appointive board. The interview was in the den of his large, modern, tastefully expensive and beautifully furnished home in a Negro suburb on the western outskirts of Charlotte.

"We've had some progress," he said. "We've moved because a fairminded group of whites -- or one or two -- were convinced not to let the situation fall in on them."

The election of Mayor Brookshire was the first move, Fred Alexander said. A change in the Chamber of Commerce attitude was the next. It was a combination of these things that allowed sitting down and talking about problems and trying to avoid disaster.

He praised Mayor Brookshire, his willingness to be helpful and give leadership, "his going into the neighborhoods and hinterlands preaching this philosophy."

You've got to talk to businessmen across the board, said Fred Alexander. "Some feel the scare technique will work. I was born and brought up here. I've seen the rough days. It's stupid to think you can scare people who build 50-story buildings. You can be a nuisance. But you can no more scare them than you can come in my house and scare me. It's a matter of whether I want to listen to you and see if there is sense in what you say." He continued:

"If it had been fear alone, Charlotte would be in the throes of a demonstration still. The willingness of the power structure and the mayor to sit down and talk was the key thing -- the ability to find Negroes and whites willing to see if the conference approach would work.

"The Mayor's Committee is not a committee of handkerchief heads. I'm in the NAACP. My brother is on the board, and state chairman. We don't sit around and make it easy for everybody. We say what we think." He said white membership was also "top flight." The committee has been the first means by which such men would sit down and talk with Negroes. "You can't get anywhere dealing with the poor white man. He's just like the Negro -- struggling."

Fred Alexander described the first year of the committee as a cat and mouse game. What did it accomplish? "The fact that Negroes and whites sat down together and stayed together twelve months was an accomplishment."

He said the committee members learned not to be afraid of each other, and that this opened doors that otherwise would have been closed. "So--we got the eating places." He said the committee counts 98 of them open to Negroes, but there had been no recent recheck to see if all were remaining open. "We have the major ones. We have enough so that Negroes don't have to wonder."

He said that talks on restaurants began about a year before the 1963 breakthrough. These were "feelers through individuals -- one or two contacts."

He said there are some "fringe places" still closed. "It's a waste of time to battle them. You could spend that time on something worthwhile."

The Mayor's Committee, he said, could handle the situation of the Greek restaurants. "The other element wants the knockdown way. Give us a chance to officially confront them... Then, if that doesn't work, I say let's organize a demonstration of the first rank. Not a hit and run thing... just to get somebody's name in the paper... and cause foolish talk. You can't do that /have a first rank demonstration/ if all you want is flapjack publicity... 'I did this and I did that...'

"The community battle of status," he continued, "goes right along with the battle of human rights. You can't control it. It's part of the mores of Negro development. You can't wipe it out. You will find it in every community."

Dissension and lack of a broad base of leadership is the cause of the Charlotte Negro's ineffectiveness in politics, he said. The Negro vote is not organized, not cohesive. He denied there were any bars to registration. "It's lack of interest in doing the most important thing the Negro can do... You can't feel politics in the palm of your hand. We must teach the Negro what politics can do." White politicians are naive, he added. A professional slickster could easily take over.

Asked at one point whether the Mayor's Committee wasn't an excellent place to get rid of anger, Fred Alexander talked at greath length on how personally he had long ago rid himself of all anger in dealing with white people, and of what a struggle it had been. "When I want to disarm an opponent," he said, "the first thing

I do is needle him and make him mad. He blows up. I let him have it...

"I move in relation to my white bretheren with steps of caution... Not with anger or righteous indignation." At another point, he said: "Some may say nothing has been accomplished here. I say something has been accomplished in Charlotte. Why use a fist when words will do it? I exterminate you just the same... The fist penalizes me and nothing is accomplished. When I break your neck with words, I deflate you and get some response from you... This isn't an overnight process or tomorrow overnight... I, as a Negro, am chafing at the bit. But I can't kill this chicken that is laying the golden egg. I've got to get a lot more eggs... I'm not saying they've done all they should do. But we're making progress..."

He criticized the multiplicity of Negro organizations. "If you've got to have noise for existence, your effectiveness is gone." Referring back to the Trade Fair negotiations on hotels, he said, "The hotels were almost crystallized... This was almost blown up in a minute by the actions of another group. We were trying to do it quietly... We were able to smooth it out."

Then he addressed himself to the overall white leadership. "The leadership is always smart enough to ease up the pressure before something happens. This is the worst kind... We'd be better off if we were where we could see it and battle it, instead of having to look for it, hunt it before we hit it."

Negroes from surrounding areas move to Charlotte, he said, thinking it is a mecca. "There is comparatively little police brutality. The man from the country can stand on the streets at night. There are no bad raids on juke joints. Nobody's going to snatch his beer and hit him with a blackjack. He's in heaven."

The city, he said, has "no big labor problems." Asked if he didn't think unionization might help in the race struggle, he said scornfully that labor unions offer little or nothing in the struggle for Negro rights in the South, not even membership.

He described Charlotte's emergence as a financial and distribution center, with increasing white collar influence, and said that "if progress in human relations is to be made in North Carolina it is fit and proper that it be made in Charlotte."

"But," he went on, "we are yet to make a dent in employment, in segregated housing and schools."

He said the effect of current urban renewal efforts and other forces was to herd Negroes together in separate housing areas as never before, and that this in turn reinforced segregation of schools. Negroes, he said, couldn't afford financially to attempt to move into a stable white neighborhood. Blockbusting occurs with little tension, he said, in transitional areas. He said the center city was increasingly Negro, and criticized a Salvation Army plan to close a mission in a previously all-white area when there were now many Negro families within sight of its doorstep desperately in need of its help.

Housing and jobs, said Fred Alexander, would be the last-ditch battles. "It's the old social bugaboo... If you live and work together, then you'll be sleeping together..."

As for employment, "there are one or two Negroes hither and there where there were whites, as in the water department. This is too slow." It's not enough for the needed change of the image of the Negro. He needs to be able to aspire to more than the professions of preacher or doctor or school teacher or lawyer. "If we're going to be successful in directing kids to the right schools, they must see Negroes in the right jobs.

"This is a problem for the Mayor's Committee to wrestle with. I told them, 'You've got to stop talking about whether there are qualified Negroes. How are you going to find qualified Negroes when a whole generation of Negroes grows up without aspirations?'"

He said he was for reverse segregation - "put Negro boys and girls in a job over the white boy and girl... a Negro must be on front of a bank just because he is a Negro-- so other Negroes can see this...and be inspired."

What would the Mayor's Committee think of this? "They are willing to think. They haven't been hurt by what has happened so far... Talk and think... It's not as fast as I want... but I'm willing to work for it... to keep bringing it up."

Fred Alexander told how the Chamber of Commerce happened to be desegregated, he having been the first of the initial group to be signed up. "They wanted Dean Rusk to be speaker at the 1962 Annual Meeting, so they invited us to join..." He told how the Chamber of Commerce officials elaborately and tactfully arranged that Negro members would be seated with white members friendly to their cause at the first annual banquet they attended.

Then, with feeling, he tried, as a background for understanding dissension among Negro leaders, to explain some of the psychological grounding of growing up in the culture he has known in Charlotte. He talked of the deliberate patterns in slavery time whereby the white owner of slaves convinced those he owned that they were the best slaves, and all others were of no account, and of the continued tradition of whites convincing Negroes who work for them to turn to them, the whites, for all assistance, and depreciating any efforts by Negroes to help themselves or each other. He described the effect upon himself and his brother of growing up in a home owned by their parents, with "no white rent man" at the door, and of having parents not employed by whites... "I grew up independent..."

He told of his efforts to help other Negroes in Charlotte to know the freeing influence of owning a home, his encouragement of a white contractor to be the first to build Negro homes, and sell them at a low margin of profit. (Now, he said, since that contractor got rich, any contractor in Charlotte is glad to build Negro homes.) The children of these people, he said, have a chance to grow up without a white-induced inferiority complex. (His business is housing. He is manager of a Negro apartment project whose construction he also encouraged as the predecessor to the private homes.)

Fred Alexander also described the base of Negro leadership in Charlotte as being extremely narrow. He said there were just not enough men with money and education to get things done, compared with such a southern city as Atlanta. He said lack of money prevented attraction of any great Negro preachers, explaining the absence generally of preachers among the leadership. He said educators tended to be concerned only with their schools. Summing up, he said: "Jobs and housing and education -- these are the keys. Our doom is sealed without them."

And: "Much depends on how long we can keep in office the type of men we have now..." (He included as very important the chairman of the county commission, Charles Lowe.)

And: "The North Carolina Fund will help too. All poverty is wrapped up in segregation and ignorance... for whites and Negroes... It transcends race."

And: "If adult Negroes ever go into the streets here, something bad is going to happen. So this should be the very last resort..."

He returned once more to the question of anger. He told of how his daughter at the age of eleven, home from a northern, integrated situation, chided him about not taking her to the airport park. She said she knew why he kept putting her off. "I don't believe," she told him, "that I like white people down here." That, said Fred Alexander, was when he had to talk strongly and truly to her. "I don't want her to grow up with any feeling of hate in her."

He also said this of his dealings with whites on the Mayor's Committee and otherwise in Charlotte affairs: "I know that they too are fighting their consciences, as I fight mine to maintain feelings of strength in belief of the goodness of their motivation..."

Fred Alexander has described himself and his brother as sort of a team. His brother, Kelly, he said, as an NAACP official was regarded by some as a radical, wasn't a member of such things as the Mayor's Committee. Those who didn't want to talk with Kelly, he said, could just come to see him and vice versa. In an office of the family funeral home, which he now runs, Kelly Alexander, darker, with a heavier moustache, talked rapidly, directly, organizing his thoughts carefully.

To understand progress in recent years, he said, required knowledge of the historical background for it, and this required knowing that until a few years ago the NAACP was "the only voice crying in the wilderness." He went on to outline NAACP involvement in getting Negro police, golf course desegregation, other recreational facilities, including swimming pools (which to date have never been much used by Negroes), voter registration, desegregation of the Democratic Party on the precinct level, and Negroes on policy making boards. He described his own two races for the city commission, claiming that whites pitted Negro opposition against him to split the Negro vote.

He described an NAACP survey of educational needs in 1947 which in effect demanded really equal separate schooling. After the 1954 school decision, the NAACP, he said, spearheaded efforts to desegregate schools. This came in 1957 in coordination with desegregation in Greensboro and Winston Salem.

He depreciated the effect of threatened demonstrations on the 1963 breakthrough, saying the real cause was the first election of Mayor Brookshire which he said was done with the help of the NAACP. He also praised the Mayor's Committee.

The NAACP program for the year, he said, includes objectives of electing Negroes to public office, "from the legislature down," particularly the school board, and increasing and expanding desegregation. The program also includes integration of public housing. Its objectives in terms of equal job opportunities is the closing of the educational gap -- following, said Kelly Alexander, the recommendations of the NAACP study of 1947. There is also a need to motivate and stimulate Negro youngsters into new skills, and continuing a battle to open new jobs.

Negroes already hold such jobs as telephone operators, bank blue and white collar workers, postmen, and higher and maintenance positions at Douglas Aircraft. There have been some in-roads in textile mills. (A notable addition to Charlotte banking was the opening in 1963 of a branch of the Mechanics and Farmers Bank of Durham, first such Negro-owned institution in the city. At dedication services, Lorimer D. Milton, president of the Citizens Trust Company of Atlanta, a Negro-owned institution, declared: "Where there are no active banks there are no rights except the right to spend... The do-gooders don't get the job done. Politicians understand only money and power and they have to have one to get the other...")

Kelly Alexander said the attitude of the administration of Governor Terry Sanford had been important in Charlotte's achievements. He said Governor Sanford understood that the state could gain only by improving the status of Negroes.

About dissension among Negro leaders, he said: "I don't have to do things at my age some people seem to think they have to do." Differences, he said, are only on technique and strategy. "We are in the minority," he said. "We must have allies." And:

"I understand what it means for a white man to come to the point where he says he will do something. My long experience in civil rights makes me appreciate a mayor like Mayor Brookshire..."

He said, he thought dissension among leaders did no more harm than fallings out that might occur between Senator Eastland and Rep. Smith of Virginia. "The difference is not sharp enough to throttle and impede the drive to freedom... My dedication to the NAACP would make me less than a leader if I didn't at all times seek to sell our position..." He said the NAACP had backed Dr. Hawkins's suit against the dental society even though he had resigned from the organization.

"There will never be a roadblock to keep any Negro from using the facilities of the NAACP to advance Negro rights..."

The buildup and background to the 1963 Charlotte breakthrough was discussed in passing by nearly everyone interviewed. Probably the most detail was given by Dr. Raymond Wheeler, a leader in the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Council on Human Relations, whose activities he outlined.

With the strong leadership of the late Harry Jones, executive director of the North Carolina Council on Human Relations, he said, the Charlotte council was active and effective in a range of activities, from writing letters to the editor to making statements before any group that would listen. He mentioned the early effort by Mr. Lowe, a strong member, to get the Chamber of Commerce to take a position on open employment.

"The Council put people on the spot and was turned down time after time, but kept coming back."

Early desegregation in Charlotte included the library, the Medical Society, the recreation facilities, the auditorium and coliseum, the United Appeal, the Unitarian congregation, and (while barring Unitarians and Jews) the Ministerial Association.

Part of the atmosphere that contributed to the 1963 breakthrough harks back to the 1957 school desegregation, and guilt attached to it. Dorothy Geraldine Counts, 15-year-old daughter of a Johnson C. Smith professor and minister, the Rev. Herman Counts, was one of three Negroes assigned to three schools. Hers was a tough one. Newspaper accounts of the time tell of a white woman in the crowd the first day when Miss Counts came to the white school, crying, "Spit on her, girls." They did -- when she entered and when she came out. Remarks were hurled and sticks thrown. "Dorothy Counts never lost her composure or her dignity. The whole thing could have been stopped by proper policing." She withdrew from the school.

The Council on Human Relations had tried to get the police department and the school board to act against the unruliness. This was unsuccessful. Then worldwide indignation over the treatment of the young woman poured into Charlotte. It was printed in the local papers. "There was a resolve it would never happen again," said Dr. Wheeler.

He cited long-running controversy over hospitals and city colleges as examples of Charlotte at its worst on race relations.

In 1955, a committee of white and Negro leaders was appointed as a social planning council to make recommendations on hospital needs. Outside consultants were brought in, and after careful study a report was rendered to the city council that hospital facilities for Negroes were wholly inadequate. In the main, these consisted of an Episcopal Church-owned hospital, then called Good Samaritan. The report to the city council said it was in such poor shape it would be impossible to renovate. The report urged a bond issue to add 250-beds to the then all-white City Memorial Hospital to be operated on a non-discriminatory basis, and that Good Samaritan be closed as soon thereafter as possible.

The city council in effect pigeon-holed these recommendations until 1959. A bond issue was subsequently passed on the basis of the report, reflecting a community concern about standards of health care for both races. Negro leaders supported it on the supposition that the recommendations on Good Samaritan would be followed. Then, as the 250-bed wing of Memorial neared completion, a committee from the Hospital Authority, representing boards of both hospitals, appeared before city council -- at first suggesting that Good Samaritan be rebuilt at a cost of $1,500,000, then retreating in the face of community protest to a recommendation that it be refurbished at a cost of $800,000. This would be temporary -- while yet another 250-bed wing was added to Memorial. In the Spring of 1960, another bond issue was voted which was regarded as accepting this interim idea.

The renovation of Good Samaritan, however, was delayed, reasons including difficulties over spending bond funds on a church-owned institution. Then when construction began on the second wing at Memorial in 1962, the plan for a virtually new building at Good Samaritan was revived by the Hospital Authority. Instead of $800,000, funds amounting to $1,300,000 were put into this. Matching funds from the federal government could not be had. Approval could not be obtained from the North Carolina Medical Care Commission which administers Hill-Burton funds. In its opinion, the hospital could not be brought up to minimum standards without unreasonable expenditure of funds. Some doctors, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Council on Human Relations, and, for the first time, the Charlotte Observer, protested. They pointed out that white doctors do not use the facility, Negro doctors do not have enough specialists among them to staff a hospital adequately, and that there are no accredited schools in the state to supply it with either Negro nurses or laboratory workers. Nevertheless, the construction went on, with the idea of keeping the facility (now called Charlotte Community Hospital and now theoretically but not in practice desegregated) going another ten or 20 years.

Memorial, meanwhile, is also, because of such pressures as inspections on specific details by the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, to some degree desegregated. Its clinics, including emergency clinics, are. But admissions are keyed to 75 or 85 beds on separate floors or wards for Negroes. Nearly all Negro indigent patients, their right to be there and their bills assured, use Memorial, leaving other Negroes to wait or to go to the inadequate Charlotte Community Hospital. Its load has decreased, and to meet bills it has to keep going back to city council for more money. To date it has no full time radiologist or pathologist, and no anesthesiologist at all, and no prospect of getting any of them.

All of this, said Dr. Wheeler, indicates a long-range and deliberate effort, "brilliantly executed," over the years to keep a segregated, all-Negro hospital in the face of factual evidence that this is financially unwise and means second-rate medical care for Negroes. The result is to reserve the best medical care for white patients, when all might, as is their minimal due, have it.

A similar story emerges on the city's colleges. From 1944 to 1959, after they were dropped from the extension system of the University of North Carolina, Charlotte College for whites and Carver College for Negroes were operated by the city's board of education. They previously had met at night in high schools and their faculties were mostly from high schools. The white college changed to day classes and became accredited as a junior college. The Negro school continued with primarily a high school-parallel curriculum, with a few graduates going on to Negro colleges. In 1959, a board of trustees over both was formed, and a bond issue proposed to build a campus for each: $575,000 for the Negro institution, $1,375,000 for the white.

The Charlotte-Mecklenburg Council on Human Relations and others questioned the wisdom of voting money for separate schools when segregation was being abandoned in state institutions of higher learning. A letter to the board of trustees was unanswered; talks with members got nowhere; finally a letter to the editor of one of the papers was published. Members of the Council on Human Relations were told they were endangering the bond issue and the negotiations with the state legislature in Raleigh for state funds. It was hinted that if they would leave the matter alone, they would eventually get what they wanted, with the Negro campus turned over to the city for a high school.

When it was announced that the contracts had been let to build the Negro college, the Council on Human Relations, with Ernest Delaney serving as spokesman, led a group of citizens before the board of directors to protest the waste of money in obvious duplications. In reply to a board statement that the Negro community wanted the Negro school, they presented a petition with 1,000 names of Negro citizens protesting it.

They were accused of being more interested in social engineering than education, and told that they were falsely injecting a racial issue into the situation.

In 1961, contracts had been let to build both schools. A suit seeking to prevent this lost in state courts. One of the schools was still called Charlotte Community College, a liberal arts, junior college. The other was called Mecklenburg College, ostensibly a vocational training institution. They were called desegregated, and the rationale for building two was that they offered different programs. But investigation proved both to have identical curricula, the only difference in them being an all-white faculty at the one, all-Negro at the other, one located in a Negro area, with students from the one being sent to the white hospital when ill, and at the other to the Negro hospital.

By 1963, enrollment at Mecklenburg had dropped so low that classes were discontinued. Students were transferred to Central Piedmont Community College, a desegregated trade school, and the college, with 13 classrooms, an administration office, and a library stands empty. Charlotte Community College meanwhile has admitted Negro students, and in 1963, some $92,000 worth of renovations was ordered there.

The pattern of clinging to a Negro institution, changing its name, and calling it desegregated did not work here as with the hospital, but in the process another large amount of money was wasted.

Against this backdrop, Dr. Wheeler said progress in the future can come only by "more hard work and different approaches."

Dr. Rufus Perry, president of Johnson C. Smith, 1000-student liberal arts and divinity school, filled in another chapter of race relations background. He described how the sit-ins came to Charlotte three days after they started at Greensboro in 1960. He read about that historical first one on a Thursday, set a faculty meeting for the following Tuesday in anticipation of sit-ins spreading, like panty raids, to his campus. They reached there on Monday, the day before the faculty meeting. His reaction? "For 30 years I had been teaching human dignity, Christian living, and brotherhood... When these people went out to attain them, I couldn't say no." His only restriction, he said, was that academic standards be maintained.

He said rapport was excellent with the police and merchants during the sit-ins. (Others, including Dr. Sidney L. Freeman, pastor of the Unitarian Church, who led the few whites participating, confirmed this.) At that stage, students didn't particularly want to be arrested, he said. Only three of his students ever were -- and charges against two were dismissed.

He and others on campus received bomb threats and other abusive communication from whites. "We ignored it." The students also had considerable support, he said, from large segments of the white community, including many who withdrew charge accounts from stores being picketed. Despite warnings that Johnson C. Smith would lose financial support, the fund campaign of the year of the sit-ins was more successful locally than it had ever been.

Dr. Perry said he thought one generally overlooked factor in all the discussion of the student movement had been the role of the influence of Negro colleges over the years -- "the sound, wholesome training." He said the highest aspirations and ideals of the student movement were simply a dramatic expression of what had been "deep in the educational philosophy of most southern Negro colleges for the 90 to 95 years of their existence..."

(The dramatic success of the sit-ins still can be startling in retrospect, to see it leap out of old news clippings from the midst of years and years of delay and slowly inching progress in other areas of racial change. Sit-ins came to Charlotte on February 9. On February 20, students were served at one lunch counter. By July, most in downtown -- seven -- were desegregated.)

Dr. Perry said there was intermittent student activity on hotels and theatres from 1961 until the Mecklenburg

Independence Day march of the Spring of 1963. Dr. Hawkins, he said, was mostly on the sidelines -- lending his car, offering advice -- until 1962 when he became "highly vocal." Since then, he had emerged as "the most vocal" Negro leader. He expressed general support of him, but said he disagreed on Dr. Hawkins's charges about voting. "It's not encouraged, but if a Negro takes the initiative to register, he can with no trouble."

Of the 1963 breakthrough, he said: "It was the same thing that happens in any community. When the power structure speaks, all opposition gives way."

Like nearly everyone, he said the immediate problems are jobs, housing, and education. (He showed a signed postcard he had received that day, for whatever it might be worth in assessing the immediate mood. "Dear Mr. President," it said. "I want you and the mayor and Harry Golden to help us colored folks. They is pushing us around too much. Please come out in the newspapers of Charlotte that you is all behind us.")

His view of employment: there had been "tremendous response" among employers to appeals to hire Negroes. Yet for specialized jobs -- engineers, for example -- there were no qualified Negroes available. He blamed "years of deprivation." As an educator, he said he knew the difficulty of motivating students to train for jobs they knew they could never get. Jobs requiring no more than a high school education -- clerical work, sales, lower-level managerial -- need opening up. "They complain of difficulty finding good clerical help. I know this is true. But it's not a racial problem. There has to be opportunity to train on the job. That's what is done -- white or Negro."

On housing, his school has applied for a $3,000,000 federal housing loan for a 300-unit low-income apartment. It will be non-segregated in policy. Until recently, he said, real estate people have succeeded in blocking most public housing.

He talked at length of overcrowding at Negro public schools, telling of the experience of his daughter in one of them. Her classes are small -- a rare thing -- because she is in a selected scholarship group, but she often misses lunch because the cafeteria is too crowded to get in.

He, too, saw the North Carolina Fund as a key factor in solving race problems of the future, and spoke of his own interest in research into the culture of poverty. With his Chamber of Commerce membership plaque on the wall behind him, he said the basic issue for the future was unity -- the concept of human rights and the fully integrated society.

Dr. Sidney L. Freeman at the Unitarian Church added these recollections of the sit-ins. They had extraordinary student leadership from Clyde Carter, Charles Jones, and Robert Gore. (The latter two have made names for themselves in national civil rights organizations since.)... Students would call police before a demonstration, in effect got an armed guard. Police maintained real order with great impartiality... The police chief then, named Jesse James, called Dr. Freeman in and expressed concern over "white ladies" getting involved with Negroes in the demonstrations. "He didn't urge against it, but he wanted me to be aware of the danger..."

Dr. Freeman, a transplanted Northerner, described how little practical power in Charlotte attaches to "old families" and "old wealth" per se, and how much it goes to men who are successful in business and assume civic leadership roles. The criterion is strictly success, he said. He also described what others noted and what became apparent in conversations: Charlotte's sense of rivalry with Atlanta in business and in cultural affairs. (Invariably, the fancy shopping centers would be compared with Atlanta's.)

Dr. Freeman also said: "The opposition provided Mayor Brookshire in his first race by Mrs. Evans may have been crucial. She forced him out on the racial question, "perhaps more than he intended."

Charles Lowe, both as president of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Council on Human Relations and personally, had a big effect on creating Charlotte's good atmosphere on race.

Mr. Lowe, a heavy-set, energetic man, is chairman of the Mecklenburg County Commission, a position not often in the South aspired to or held by a man outspoken for better race relations. How did he happen to get in politics? "I was an adopted child," he answered in a sort of telescoped use of words that seems to be characteristic. "So this might be considered noblesse oblige."

He said he hadn't particularly enjoyed politics, but felt it was something he should do. He apparently has spent much effort getting others to run. He said the calibre of the county commission is now such that there is no longer a tendency to pass the buck to the city, and there is a willingness to use planners and modern methods on problems.

The county now hires Negroes as farm agents, laborers, nurses, and welfare and juvenile court case workers. The commission is discussing Negro deputy sheriffs and secretaries.

People in the county, particularly low-income, rural whites, are less inclined to accept desegregation than those in Charlotte, he said. (This is a problem cited by school officials; the city and county systems are combined.) Mr. Lowe said he thought part of the trouble is fear of something or someone they don't know. He recalled how in his business, an electrical distributing firm in a warehouse-like building out from the downtown, he called in his force and asked if they would object to his promoting a young Negro maintenance man to a fairly important job. The man knew the duties, and was capable, he told his other workers. Sure, they responded, because they knew him, we'd like to see him make more money.

Mr. Lowe talked of a move afoot by the personnel manager at Douglas Aircraft to get all agencies together interested in hiring on merit for regular meetings to discuss problems. He showed a letter giving results of such a meeting -- an agreement to seek North Carolina Fund money for a placement bureau to be run by the East Side Council on Community Affairs headed by the young Negro leader LeRoy Polk, and an agreement to seek a seminar by the Mayor's Committee on employment of Negroes.

Many people, he said, think things but are afraid to go out on a limb. This sort of thing gives them courage.

(As an indication of the complex interconnections of people and events in Charlotte race relations, Dr. Hawkins was critical of a written presentation on the Placement Bureau prepared by Mr. Polk's organization. He called it a means for the white employer to get the "monkey off his back" and termed Uncle Tomism a paragraph which said: "the only 'cause' the Bureau will advocate is JOBS. The only thing it will 'propagandize' for is JOBS. The only 'marches' it will join are marches to WORK. The only 'advancement' it will advocate will be job advancement through merit. The only 'right' it will plead for is the right to WORK!")

Mr. Lowe said that the approach needed and possible in Charlotte on jobs, as on all other aspects of race, is the one used by an intelligent community on any other problem -- a sitting and looking at the problem and working out rational solutions. "We need to sit and look at the race problem just like we do any other problem... Figure out how to solve it... Set up a timetable... and work at it..."

Like most others, he said the North Carolina Fund is a key to the future, that the day is closing when poor whites and Negroes will allow themselves to be pitted against each other, when their problems are the same. He, alone among those interviewed, mentioned labor leaders in the area, praising them. He said they were doing as well as they could on race and other activities. He singled out for praise Floyd Henderson, president of the Charlotte Central Labor Union.

Of Dr. Hawkins, he said there was honest difference of opinion. The white man's view is that he has done a lot of good and harm. "He pushed us faster than we wanted to go." He made many mad. "Some think he hurt race relations. But in his own way, I expect he helped. I tell my white friends if we were Negroes, I expect we would say things are too slow." He said Negroes in good positions tend to like the status quo as much as their white counterparts. "The youngsters challenge them as much as the whites. It's like competition in business. It's human nature. How to get all people to look at problems objectively, instead of what's in it for me -- that's what we need."

The future, said Charles Lowe, will see some leveling off -- no continuation of the "tremendous" progress of the past few years. There will be gains but not as fast. Negroes will need "to study harder, to toe the mark, to seek jobs on quality, not on the basis of race...

"In the past, it's been dog eat dog. Now, it's live and let live. Within the next ten years, we may have 'live and help live.'"

Mr. Lowe, in discussion of how the good atmosphere for the breakthrough was built, said churches had not been in the forefront, but had done much good behind the scenes. He, like many others, singled out Dr. Carlyle Marney, pastor of the Myers Park Baptist Church, as one who was outspoken, who didn't seem to share the feeling of many preachers that gestures costing loss of a job accomplish nothing.

In his book-lined, paneled office at the magnificent church in Charlotte's finger-bowl district, Dr. Marney, a happy-faced, middle-aged man who has published Structures of Prejudice and other books, said yes, he carried his resignation around in his pocket.

He introduced the attractive young Negro woman who is one of the church secretaries, showed the Negro children in an integrated nursery school, and described activities of the church, including a regular Sunday morning TV program on race relations, a mission program to help "mamas with nothing but 300 years of hopelessness to give their children," and plans for sending the youth of the church into the slums to help a family apiece. He described some of the special presentations members of the church have been faced with, including a program in the format of a radio show in which four Charlotte high schoolers from behind a curtain, unseen, talked feelingly of their ambitions in life. There was a gasp in the congregation when the curtain was pulled away and two of the high schoolers were revealed to be Negroes. (The congregation is not desegregated.

When it does become so, Dr. Marney said he feared it would be only by Negroes "of our class.")

Dr. Marney said he didn't create what was in the church -- which includes in its membership many of the rich and powerful men who made the 1963 breakthrough possible. It was there when he came, he said. He related what he told the committee which came to hire him: "They asked what I thought of them and I said you're a bunch of nice fellows down here at this cross-roads. When the tracks came through from New York to Atlanta, you said the Lord gave it to you, and you wanted to show your appreciation to Him. You know it was the devil, but you went on, built something beautiful for the Lord anyhow with this church. And now you want somebody to lacerate you every Sunday so you can brag about not firing him..."

He said he told them he didn't believe anyone of them knew himself. One spoke up: "I know who I am. I'm a bastard. And if somebody doesn't change me, I'm going to die that way..." He accepted their offer.

Charlotte, said Dr. Marney, "is in very grave danger. The danger is that we're not going to get anything done... after this great breakthrough."

Nearly everyone who discussed the breakthrough in light of past accomplishments and future developments spoke of how slowly Charlotte schools had moved on desegregation after the initial action in 1957. Of 70,000 pupils (about 50,000 white, 20,000 Negro), 490 Negroes are officially designated as being in desegregated schools. However, 418 of these are in one school which has seven white pupils. The other 72 are in seven of the 103 schools. In all, 38 schools are said to have pupils assigned on the basis of neighborhood residence, 31 of them evidently in all-white or all-Negro neighborhoods. Under the Pearsall Plan by which desegregation has been guided, white pupils may request transfers out of schools where Negroes have gained entrance -- a so-called "safety valve."

Dr. William C. Self, assistant superintendent of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg School System (they were combined in 1960), discussed the situation in a pleasant, quiet, disengaged sort of way. He said there was "smooth sailing" in the schools, that the neighborhood plan was working out well. Asked about such charges as Dr. Hawkins's that neighborhood groupings for schools are gerrymandered on the basis of race, he said that if there was gerrymandering it was in order to fill up classrooms. Asked about integration of faculties, he said the board of education's whole direction of movement was in terms of the neighborhood plan. Asked if the neighborhood plan had anything to do with faculty desegregation, he said it did not. Asked again about faculty desegregation, he was noncommital.

At another point, he did say that a summer school for children with special interests and talents in 1963 had one Negro teacher, a male teacher of mathematics. There was no trouble, he said.

He seemed to think Charlotte's centering its North Carolina Fund plans around schools was a good idea. But he said community problems could not be solved by schools -- that if other forces in the society didn't work on them, if they were left to the schools alone, they wouldn't be solved.

He said one of the biggest problems of schools was keeping buildings up with population growth. With a growth rate of 3,600 new pupils a year, the system, despite extensive construction, is still 4,000 to 4,500 pupils behind. Mobile classrooms and partitions of available space fill the gap.

He cited the record of Charlotte voters on school bonds, an impressive bit of evidence of the state of civic health: separate issues were approved in 1946, 1950, 1952, 1955, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1961, and 1963 -- all told, 66.6 million dollars worth.

An article in the February 1964, issue of The Nation's Schools, somewhat disapproving of Charlotte's lack of much deliberate speed on school desegregation, pointed out that Negroes heavily supported the bond issues, including the most recent, for $15,600,000 in December 1963. The same article quoted Harry Golden, outspoken weekly newspaper pundit and nationally known author of works often centered on the race question, as saying of the school situation: "They've done something in Charlotte, but they could have done it all. You must think of North Carolina in terms of great disappointment, because it is the most liberal state in the South. The folks were ready for desegregation; they were merely waiting for direction... They had the opportunity to lead the South by starting a tradition. They could have built a reputation that would have lasted forever..."

In an interview Mr. Golden said the Charlotte School Board (before the merger) had been "as cruel an outfit as any in the South." He was particularly scornful of the procedure for handling Negro children requesting transfers --"they were made to bring their parents and were asked questions about 'Aren't you happy with your own people?' -- questions that would give pause to Freud."

Dr. Freeman confirmed this, recalling one of the first such sessions which he witnessed. A Negro student and his parents were before the board, under questioning which "presumed them guilty until they proved themselves innocent." The youth, he said, kept his head and outtalked them in answer to such questions as why did he want to leave his friends and go to a school where he knew no one, and wasn't his school a good one, etc. "This has mellowed," according to Dr. Freeman. The PTA and League of Women Voters sends observers to all meetings of the board.

A Negro told of the experience recently of the two young ladies who are the only Negroes in the high school which serves the most exclusive white neighborhoods. "The acceptance has been just beautiful. They've been invited to senior parties in homes, and picked up to attend all the games." One white youth tried to give them trouble, and the other kids "got on his back." A tradition for this was established earlier at the school when the senior boys let it be know that anyone who bothered a lone Negro youth admitted to the school would have them to contend with. This youth won a scholarship to college; the two girls are doing well in their grades.

A Negro teacher described conditions at one of the Negro schools, an ancient one: Negro pupils pass by white schools to attend it. There is no real equality of equipment. The school might have as good microscopes, but while it has two, its white counterpart would have

20. Classes in white and Negro schools are overcrowded. Pupils at the Negro school, from low to middle class homes, are not really well motivated, have not experienced the kind of stimulus that would cause them to seek quality training. A good kid from a bad family does well the first four years, begins to lag behind, goes down, finally drops out. Another problem is that administrators of Negro schools are themselves Negroes of the "old school" and incapable often of independence, while teachers are often people who have struggled up from the same environment that cripples their pupils. They regard their job as an ultimate achievement, and have had no opportunity to find their way into the main streams of today's education.

David W. Harris is chairman of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg County School Board. He was vice chairman of the county board when the merger came. In his brokerage office (with an indoor putting-practice rig by his desk) at the modernistic Charlottetown Mall shopping center (with stores with open fronts and a display in the mall of surprisingly good high school art), Mr. Harris talked with the urbanity and charm of his occupation and stage (middlish young) of life:

"They say we have done as little as possible, and it may be that we haven't done all we could. But it's safer to take the conservative course than to push to the danger point. There was a great deal of fear that was without foundation about desegregation. This is what we wanted to prove -- that it was without foundation. We wanted to show that it could be done, not how far we could go and how fast. If you want to build a house, you don't build the roof first...

"That's what we've been working on... We're in a position now to move... We don't want to risk a Birmingham. We've avoided bombings. It only takes one to get you in trouble.... This is something we didn't create; we inherited it...

"I'm not real happy with the progress we've made; but we will do a great deal more." (Reaction of several Negroes when asked about this promise was an almost cynical "When?")

Specifically, Mr. Harris said that "percentage-wise," the number of Negroes in desegregated schools would accelerate "considerably" during the coming year. Acceleration is possible now "because the pattern is set."

He also said: The neighborhood assignment policy was what Negroes asked for at first... Opposition to desegregation was not publicized but it was heavy from groups and individuals. This was part of the reason for going slow... Only one parent took his child out of the special summer school class with a Negro teacher... A good school here and there is not the answer. One bad school in the system hurts all schools... White and Negro low income areas are generally served by the poorest teachers. There is serious consideration of assigning them the best teachers... School walkouts by Negroes would do great damage; there seems little likelihood of this so long as Negro leaders have open communication with the white leadership... An integrated faculty will "come in time." It is regarded as a "major change." ...

"As a school board," said David W. Harris, whose father was a teacher all his life, and who himself started out as a teacher, "we would like to do away with segregation tomorrow. But we're convinced we couldn't get away with it. We would lose the progress we have made."

(In the mall outside his office, the high school art on display ranged from carefully conscientious realism to abstract portraiture. Pictures of farm houses and city streets showed a feeling for regional flavor. Shoppers were caught by the art as they hurried by, and would turn and bend to the pictures, studying them. One of those carefully studying a pointillist technique in a painting of a big house and yard was a Negro youth, extremely neatly dressed. He looked of high school age and as though he had come out to the shopping center just to see the display.)

Invariably when Charlotte people talked of the race relations of the future, they pinned hopes on the efforts to include the city in the North Carolina Fund, a foundation-financed, matching-fund program attacking poverty. Awareness is high that race problems are linked to the problems of poverty which transcend race. Not so high is the awareness of the extent of white and Negro poverty in the city, and while there are many groups "trying to do something," there is virtually no coordination. The North Carolina Fund would indeed be a way for Charlotte to move into some of the more complex, deeper cultural causes and results of discrimination, after its success with surface desegregation.

The proposal for including Charlotte in the program contains the set of dismal statistics becoming familiar in descriptions of what ails most American cities. Here is a sampling: while Charlotte is the largest city with the greatest economic power in the Carolinas, with the highest median income, it also has more poverty, a higher crime rate, more public assistance cases, more overcrowded dwelling units, more illegitimacy, more tuberculosis and venereal disease, more cases in Juvenile Court, and the largest adult population with less than five years of schooling.

A total of 14,000 families make less than $3,000 a year, 3,000 of whom make less than $1,000 a year. Median income for white families is $6,440, for Negroes, $2,904. Three-fourths of the Negro families make less than $4,000. Half make less than $3,000. Fifty-five per cent of school children are white, but of the three-fourths of dropouts attributable to poverty, 47% are Negro, compared with 24% white. There is a 3.2% unemployment rate, low by national comparisons, and a shortage of skills: stenographers, machine operators, auto mechanics, welders, draftsmen. Recent attention to urban renewal and public housing and tighter enforcement of a tighter housing code has not dented 4,000 blighted houses, 6,000 in need of repairs. An impoverished family with six children cannot get public housing, and only the worst of private housing.

In 1962, the crime rate was 15.9 per 1,000. (A newspaper account gives breakdowns. Murder and non-negligent manslaughter: nine whites arrested, 29 Negroes. Forcible rape, five whites, 26 Negroes. Armed robbery, 17 whites, 70 Negroes. Police Chief John Hord, who wears a civilian suit in his little office cluttered with the trophies and sentimentality of the professional police officer, said that the high crime rate follows the inhabitants of a slum cleared by urban renewal to whatever slum they go to. He talked of efforts of the Chamber of Commerce Crime Committee and the Mayor's Crime Committee to study causes and cures of crime. He said his men "enforce the law as fair as we know how. We treat colored just as we do white as long as they'll let us. If one jumps on an officer, though, we don't care how we get him off." He spoke of the traditional generosity of police to poor families, and from his professional knowledge of the situation, spoke feelingly of the plight of Negro and white slum children: "No father, and the mother works and he roams the streets. He's got no fair chance." As for poverty in general, Chief Hord said: "We're going to have to do something.")

The Charlotte Fund proposal says: "Special attention must be given to race as an important factor contributing to poverty... A practical astute achievement such as this /desegregation of restaurants, hotels/ delights us, but the disparity of opportunity is still very great with half of our Negro families falling below the poverty line. We are restless about the fact that traditional methods do not offer adequate solutions."

The proposal has an eight-point program to be administered in four neighborhoods, using junior high schools as centers. The eight points are (1) school readiness: a 6 to 8 week summer school, afternoon and Saturday programs, kindergartens; (2) health clinics emphasizing preventive medicine (a pilot project by the Public Health and Welfare Departments administered oral contraceptives to 300 volunteers); (3) job opportunities: job training and Mr. Polk's placement bureau; (4) adult education: everything from the three R's to leadership training, with emphasis on home improvement; (5) a staffed youth program; (6) data correlation; (7) special services: teams of counselors, psychologists, and social workers; (8) neighborhood centers.

Pete McKnight, editor of the Charlotte News, is president of the North Carolina Fund. He said frankly he doesn't know whether Charlotte will be included. If it should be, it would follow the state policy of directly involving Negroes with whites in solving a common problem. (Since then Charlotte was selected to participate.) He said the two big problems are education and jobs, and that no one expects to "remake adults... The real hope is to cut off this generation of kids from the cycle of poverty." He pointed out, as had others, that whites as well as Negroes are among the impoverished, that the problems are the same.

The one man interviewed who didn't view the Charlotte Plan -- as presently conceived -- with total approval was Dr. Hawkins. He voiced as his first criticism that the group which conceived it had no Negro membership. He said that its first step should be announcement of integration of schools, jobs and housing. He urged a reading program from age 4 to 6... an incentive program for adult education in the form of payments slightly higher and in lieu of welfare payments for attendance at schools... A commitment from every employer for equal employment to solve the job problem with responsibility on them -- "not us" -- to recruit and train personnel... open occupancy and rent control and tighter enforcement of the housing code to improve housing.

The Charlotte Fund proposal singled out what is at once the most difficult and most hopeful thing about Charlotte's concern with poverty. Noting what is readily apparent to an outsider, the tremendous activity by many groups in this area, it says: "Yet these projects are as fragmented as they are earnest, and they lack central direction, analysis and thrust. They are encouraged--but not powered--by the kind of concentrated community good-will that has built for Charlotte a solid reputation in business and industrial growth, progressive government and productive race relations. At the core of Charlotte's proposal to the North Carolina Fund lies determination to muster that 'will' and sustain it..."

* * * * *

Most of what the people of Charlotte, in discussing their race situation, talked about, argued about had already happened. It was in the almost off-hand appraisal of future problems that they showed an exciting, almost unaware acceptance of an approach to the future unlike anything we have known before in the South.

Here, in telescoped form, are three more interviews to illustrate this, to round out this report, and -- because of a deliberate selection of disparate viewpoints and personalities -- to show again the drama of the human story of Charlotte, where people and events intertwine like the unplanned streets of an American town, unduly complicated, perhaps, not anywhere near as efficient or rational as a machine might make, but full of a wonderful variety and vigor and potential...

In an office full of books, records and momentoes of his successful career as enfant terrible of southern liberalism, Harry Golden, in a bright red sport shirt, with his paunch and his cigar, sat rocking and talking of Charlotte in sentences that could have gone down almost verbatim as an essay in The Carolina Israelite, his paper of opinion, if not in one of his many books of similar material.

"You've got to consider the structure. Start with at least 500 branch offices and warehouses managed by men making 15 to 30 thousand dollars, brought from the Midwest, Long Island, and Westchester County with political and economic values supported in the Midwest, Long Island, and Westchester County. The distributing end is so big here that these men are the hard core of the power structure. Local merchants and manufacturers and distributors take from these managers with northern and midwestern backgrounds some of their political ideas. They are blended. The interests are the same. Some northern managers accommodate by taking on the sociological views of the South. But the connections are not deep. A man from IBM or Pitney Bowes comes in, and the first thing he does is sit down and write a letter to the editor -- 'what a beautiful city you have here... and one thing I've noticed is the controversy about integration. I know integration won't work. I'm from Ohio and I know...'"

The managerial class, he said, is one in economic and political views. Racial views are reflected by their Republican Congressman -- who never uses the word race. Politics are oriented to the society, and in heated elections and primaries, the candidates don't see fit to mention race.

"On this basis, my partly humorous comment is valid... They would elect Martin King or Malcolm X mayor if somehow one of them could give them a guarantee of no labor unions and no minimum wage for laundry workers."

He said he used the crack to make the point that "this city could have been integrated from top to bottom after the Supreme Court decision in 1954... Why they didn't has concerned me for years. My conclusion is that while these people make a fetish of individual initiative and individual freedom of action, they are as enslaved to the section as any group in it, including Jews, Irish, and Negroes." They act, he said, as a unit. "They don't want to hurt Mississippi and Georgia and Alabama..."

He recalled the day when Dorothy Counts withdrew from the white school after the spitting incident. "Three or four of us went to her father to plead with him not to withdraw her... He showed us a pad of four pages of telephone calls of sympathy and condolences -- 48 names. They were the leading citizens. Any one of them expressing what they had said in public could have smashed things. But they didn't..."

The big point, he said, was that not a single measure of progress has been made in Charlotte without pressure, either from law, from demonstrations or the fear of demonstrations. "Negro militancy is the only thing that will do it." And:

"It's a city with more churches than any other with the possible exception of Glasgow... without ever being moved by Christian charity...

"Charlotte had such an opportunity for prestige... It could have been a byword for racial progress all over the world..."

Perry Morgan is another editor, with another approach. As managing editor of the Charlotte News (Cash's paper, once considered the more liberal, now the more conservative of Charlotte's two papers), he has had a hand in some of the things that have happened, an insider's view, and an influence on public opinion.

The ministers, he said, set the tone for the 1963 breakthrough. Just their presence at the executive committee meeting "added to the courage of those who spoke out."

The key to understanding it, he went on, is Charlotte's fundamental stability, its fear of excess. (The whole state is this way, he said.) "People don't like to be though of as anti-Negro... There are a few iron-headed segregationists here... and these are some of the finest and most civil people you'd want to meet... One had a Negro in a prominent position in his firm; he is a sincere segregationist but not a nigger hater."

Force has been minor in Charlotte's progress, he said. The real force is the consensus which says: "Be sure you know what you're doing when you move. Don't be silly. And don't shove us; tell us why."

Dissatisfaction with tokenism is manifested by only a minority of Negroes. The body of Negro leaders tend to the same emotional characteristics as whites: "Work it out... Accommodate."

"I think they feel they're not in the Elysian Fields, and that Charlotte is not as progressive as whites think it is, but all the same, they feel they're better off than most... And they have the same pride in it."

He said he didn't think there would be renewed demonstrations, as at Chapel Hill. They key would be "young actionists from outside." They might try, "but they would be unable to carry the community... unable to achieve anything through force. 'Don't push me.' Dr. Hawkins would be the only one who would go along with them, and then only if circumstances were favorable..."

"The North Carolina Fund could be exceedingly important. It legitimizes a concern over poverty, and in Charlotte once a problem is brought into the arena, something will be done if it is needed... Just the fact of planning -- if it stops tomorrow -- is of great value..."

The important thing here is that "whites and Negroes would be grappling with the reality of the Negro condition -- poverty, ignorance, disease."

This is why, he said, he grew weary with the freedom rides (although he conceded their contributions to individual self-confidence.) They involved "so much agony for a victory that means nothing to the mass of Negroes."

Liberals and conservatives alike use the cliche of the civil rights legislation to hide from reality -- "which is that this is a problem that will take an uncountable amount of work, wisdom, and years and years to solve."

The important thing with the Fund is that people actually face this, "with the power structure in the fore... You can't do anything without the power structure in charge. Here it can understand, and does understand, and is capable of leadership."

The need, he said, is to enter these things "freely and with good conscience..." If it is necessary for the solution of the problems of poverty to desegregate schools, this is preferable to doing it through courts and social dogma. It's the same with social contact. "I shrink from doing it for the sake of doing it. This implies acceptance of the premise that we must live and work and play together and I don't believe that is accepted anywhere... here or in the North."

It is a question of "integration on one base rather than another. People get used to ignoring color when the person is an obvious equal. But if it's just assertion of a writ, I don't accept it."

People grow into things. The way Charlotte is doing is far preferable to civil rights legislation. Growth is not at a "breathtaking rate... and when it happens, it stays."

He conceded that the 1963 breakthrough would not have happened without Birmingham. "But I hope pressure will stop short of force... that the momentum will continue... that we work it out and have it accepted as something we did. The tone is important: the absence of rancor and bitterness."

The next interview took place in the second floor office of a funeral home, with the dusk sounds of a Negro slum all around, children shouting, and wailing, adult cries, a fire engine shrieking danger through the narrow streets. Answering the questions were James K. Polk, son-in-law of the funeral home owner, educated at Johnson C. Smith and Temple University, young, urbane, and relaxed, and Willie Davis, an elementary school teacher, a graduate of the University of Minnesota, with a masters from Columbia, more intense, equally urbane. They are the leaders of the East Side Council on Civic Affairs, the group which has conducted conversations with the top white leadership and which organized the Charlotte Placement Bureau. Mr. Polk is spoken of by some white liberals as perhaps the new look in Negro leadership, someone able to resolve the dissensions, or transcend them. Characteristically, both the older Negro leadership spokesmen and Dr. Hawkins were less enthusiastic but generally favorable to these two new-comer young leaders.

Mr. Polk and Mr. Davis talked in turns, backing up or supplementing what the other had to say. Their thoughts are rendered here in direct and indirect quotations.

Polk: "They needed to attract business. They used a Negro on an industry hunting mission in the North. They knew they couldn't do it with poor race relations. I don't think it was a moral decision. I would hope they would add these things... We got in by the back door, but we must realize that this took courage... This is it when the Chamber of Commerce speaks... We were willing to go through all the trial periods -- to do what we had to do to break the ice."

Davis: "Charlotte has not done all it should. Its church-going doesn't show up in its behavior."

Polk: "Churches ignore the problem because if they faced it, they wouldn't be able to avoid their duty... We don't have time for their hearts to change... These influential people tell us inadvertently that they will do nothing unless forced to. They suggest demonstrations without realizing what they say."

They talked of the slowness of school desegregation, the lack still of any carefully defined plan upon which Negro expectations and reactions might be based. Was their group contemplating action?

Polk: "No. We are not to the point where we could influence boycotts or law suits. It's possible we could get to that, if we found it necessary."

Davis: "Jobs are still a big problem. There are many vocations still closed. For example, there are no Negro cab drivers, and few sales people."

Polk: "I think we're moving some. Some companies are opening. But there are still too few employees. They would have you believe it's a problem to find qualified Negroes. This means being head and shoulders above the white secretary at the next desk... But we're willing to accept this... to break the ice... solely for expediency."

Davis: "They are willing to train whites. But the Negro must be trained and experienced before he can be hired." There are no Negro plumbers and electricians. They are trained, but can't be licensed. They can be licensed in many North Carolina cities. Here, an apprentice must have two licensed people to vouch for him... So Negroes are hired as common laborers to do this skilled work at low wages. "How do you break such a vicious cycle without federal legislation?"

Polk: "We registered four or five thousand voters. We had to take them in: there's no telling what we could do if we could get registrars out in the precincts... We are working on precinct and block voter organization."

Davis: Dissension? We're not moving for power... We have great respect for the other leaders. We don't want to steal anybody's thunder. But we will go in where nothing is being done...

Davis: "I hope those white leaders we /the East Side Council/ have met with left the meetings with the impression that we were using a diplomatic approach. We want to let them know how we feel as human beings."

Polk: "I think we are having more effect than the Mayor's Committee /of which he is a member/. We work harder. The committee people are busy. They don't have time for these things. In our meetings, we have time to sit and seek understanding of how things seem to us, and what can be done on such things as jobs, education, and beautification of the community. We talk with each leader in the area of his concentration. We spell out our hopes and aspirations. We don't tell any of them who else has been in to talk with us. It's all in confidence, to inspire their confidence. It is frank discussion. They have all said they would be willing to come back.

"There's no backing down on principle, regardless of their stature. The method and procedure is give and take...

"It's a beautiful experience for us, and for those men. Many of them never had an opportunity to sit down and have Negroes disagree with them. They're such big men..."

* * * * * * *

Three central facts stand out to form the pattern in Charlotte's race relations progress.

One is the ability of the city's leadership -- that almost mystical concept of contemporary sociology called the power structure -- to appraise racial pressures with relative dispassion, to make decisions about what the city must do, and, most importantly, to act upon them. This illustrates what may be a basic fact in civil rights -- that when the downtown elite really wants action, the city obeys. This is a commentary perhaps on the state of our democracy, and unfortunately more often seen in the South when the men of power speak evil, or by not speaking, affirm segregation and resistance to law, or, as of late in some cities, seem to speak for progress but do not really mean it. The leadership in many cities will tell you that they have done the kind of thing that Charlotte actually achieved. In others they will piously speak of "all we have done for our Negroes," at the very moment a fierce demonstration against intolerable conditions is going on outside their office windows. Unlike such leaders, the white leaders of Charlotte do not slide their eyes away when they make their hometown boosterism boasts. They have done what they say they have done; there is a pride in them about it. They are more likely to discuss what they haven't done, and they are less defensive, more inclined to promise further change. And these attitudes are reflected among the people of the city.

The second fact is that constant pressure from Negro leaders -- most notably in the past from Dr. Hawkins -- is an acknowledged ingredient of all the progress that has been made. The orientation of Negro leadership has been toward getting results rather than plunging into protest expressive of despair. Strategy came out of research, and seemed carefully planned.

The third fact is the existence of the Mayor's Committee on Human Relations as an apparatus for channeling the pressured decisions of the business leadership into acceptable action. It also serves as a conductor of the pressure and as a place for letting off steam by both sides, and, surely most important of all, as a setting where intelligent and sensitive representatives of races long estranged and blocked by invalid over-generalizations from one another may come to the knowledge, in the gradual way of the human mind and emotions, of the individuality of each man and thus to the real truth of the race problems with which they deal.

It is important, too, to say that all of this analysis about pressure and reaction to pressure is meaningless without awareness that working through it at all levels are such unanalyzable attributes of the human heart as courage, dedication, moral commitment, intellectual honesty, devotion to duty, and simple kindness displayed in happy quantity by members of both races struggling with a great burden of the past in Charlotte.

Combined, these things form the pattern which has enabled the city, since the sit-ins, to act before demonstrations were considered necessary by Negroes -- and to whatever extent race relations are good in Charlotte, it is attributable to this pattern.

It is obvious that race relations are neither perfect nor particularly happy yet. The undercurrents of criticism and dissatisfaction which swirl in any conversation with Negroes are in part an expression, surely, of the similar undercurrent of distaste or doubt among many whites about the progress that has been made. It is becoming clear that in the long and arduous American adventure that is the race revolution, such undercurrents of antagonism are going to have to be accepted and handled by people as best they can as a normal part of the process of change.

The Negro dissatisfaction is an expression, too, of reaction to the instances where the white antagonisms to change have held sway -- most notably at the hospital, the colleges, and, to a degree, the public schools. Yet these situations tend to bear out what has just been described as the pattern by which Charlotte has changed.

It was pointed out in various of the interviews as something of an explanation for the disparities in these areas that the men on the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Hospital Authority, the Board of Directors of the Community College System, and the men on the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education are not the same, for the most part, as the men out front and making progress through such an organization as the Chamber of Commerce.

While this is true, it is reasonable to assume -- and interviews confirmed this opinion -- that there are ties (business, social, and otherwise) between all four sets of men. It is also reasonable to assume that if the city's highest leadership had wanted to or needed to put a stop to the machinations involving hospitals, colleges, and schools, they could have, with the same thoroughness with which compliance on desegregation of public accommodations was achieved.

The point would seem to be both that the pressure was not applied as efficiently in these areas as it was in public accommodations by Negro leadership, and that these situations were complex enough to allow more maneuverability against pressure. In all three instances, something beyond direct action or the threat of it was called for. Dr. Hawkins's efforts to get help from HEW on the hospital is indicative more than anything else of the kind of performance that has come to be expected of that agency of the federal government in such matters. They would investigate only one charge at a time, Dr. Hawkins said, rather than look at the hospital's segregation situation as a whole.

Aside from that, the failure of Negro leadership to apply efficient pressure -- as in, say, court suits -- must in some degree be attributable to the amount of dissension and antagonism among the Negro leaders. Where a concerted and cooperative effort seemed to be called for to develop a sophisticated strategy akin to business dealing or labor-management maneuvering, Charlotte's Negro leadership has been split and devoting much energy to battling each other.

This dissension is in the emergingly typical framework common to much Negro leadership at all levels in the nation: older negotiation-inclined, tolerant Negroes versus younger men who are full of impatience and inclined to action. One almost gets the feeling that the racial struggle in Charlotte has fallen into a battle of personalities that transcends race. Much at one time might have been achieved for mutual progress with the simple act of giving more recognition and honor to the contributions of Dr. Hawkins, and of acknowledgement from younger leaders of the achievements "back when things were rough" of the older leaders.

At this writing, the dissension has broken into the open with charges and counter charges over registration performance and policy of the factions.

It seems crucial to future Charlotte progress that somehow all of this internecine battling be resolved.

The city, in part, seems settled in a pattern of amicable conference table competition between the races. In another way, it almost seems that the challenge to Negro leadership is not any more to keep up with what the white people are trying to do to them, but to keep up with white leadership in moves toward the kind of society that they, the Negroes, desire.

There will continue to be the need in the fight against de facto segregation, especially of jobs and housing, for concerted and effective Negro representation in the kind of day-to-day struggle of self-interest that is common to much of the American society's achievement in other areas. And there will continue, in Charlotte's attack on poverty, a great opportunity for Negro leadership to give invaluable assistance and to make sure that goals and results are appropriately within the framework of the open society. The challenge to much of the white citizenship centers on the need to find better reasons than pressure for living up to America's idealism.

In both cases, Charlotte seems about done with the southern battles of 100 and 200 years ago, and has moved its racial concerns into the mainstream of American thought and activity. One leaves it wondering if the leadership there, white and Negro, is capable of overcoming whatever blocks there are to a continuation of the kind of creative will they have mustered in the past. If so, not just the South but the nation might soon look to Charlotte for leadership.

COOPERATIVES, CREDIT UNIONS AND NEGROES IN THE RURAL SOUTH

The Economic Dilemma

The southern rural Negro is in a time of peril. The civil rights achievements of the past few years -- gains that have profited middle-class Negroes -- are only a list of laws on a piece of legal scrip for the Negro in poverty. The civil rights movement somehow went by the poor Negroes in the United States, and the southern rural Negro -- whether he is a farmer or a sharecropper -- is in a dilemma. The cause of this dilemma is an almost total lack of economic independence. Civil rights workers in the South have urged people to register to vote, or have advised them to put their children in a "white" school. A number of brave men did these things. The results thus far have not satisfied either the civil rights workers or the men they advised. Now there appears to be a concern (a long overdue concern, though one which perhaps had to wait until now) that the Negro cannot exercise the rights that legislation has awarded him unless he is economically free.

There is a growing interest in attempting to attack the problem of minimal economic independence of rural southern Negroes through the use of cooperatives and credit unions. Recently organized co-ops and credit unions can be observed across the Black Belt of the South.

A Note of Caution

While we commend their basic philosophy as being admirable we think it is important that cooperatives and credit unions not be accepted as cure-alls for the southern rural Negro's economic problems. Instead, they should be closely examined to see what they are and to ascertain where they fit into what has to be a massive effort aimed at improving the economic position of the southern rural Negro. Two points can be made here: where a successful cooperative already exists it is preferable to JOIN IT rather than to begin another cooperative organization. If it is impossible to become a member of an existing cooperative or if there is no cooperative supplying the service required, then before a cooperative is seriously considered a FEASIBILITY STUDY should be made. Such a study would attempt to find out the following information:

-- the need for the cooperative
-- the potential membership in such a cooperative
-- the management skills needed to run the organization successfully

-- the facilities needed

-- the operating costs

-- the capital required

-- how or whether to incorporate.

It is natural that civil rights groups turned to cooperatives when they were confronted with the rural Negro's need for financial independence. Ideally, cooperatives offer an individual or a group the power to make decisions concerning their own lives. The civil rights movement is concerned with helping people achieve this same decision-making power, which is the integral substance of freedom. It is both natural and good that the two came together. But the marriage should not be a hurried one. There is some question of the compatibility of cooperatives with the present needs of poor rural southern Negroes. The following discussion of some of the things that cooperatives are and aren't is an attempt to answer this question.

Cooperatives are businesses. That cooperation is a good thing is not enough to guarantee success. A business established by groups of people, owned and controlled and largely patronized by these same groups, is still a business and it must have at least as efficient operations as those of its competitors. The business record of cooperatives reveals that about the same number of cooperatives and mutual businesses have failed as other businesses. Cooperative businesses are not automatically guaranteed success.

Cooperatives are a hard kind of business to start and an even harder kind to operate successfully.

Cooperatives demand excellent management if they are to succeed.

Cooperatives almost always lack capital. Basic capital must always come from members of co-ops. When these members are poor, there is a lack of capital.

Cooperatives are, in most lines of business, up against stiff competition from highly efficient competitors.

Experiments In Business

Negroes in the Black Belt are experimenting with small grocery cooperatives. The average store is a small building located in the Negro neighborhood. It is owned by perhaps twenty or more men. Their investment ranges from $25 up. How good an investment is it? There is a history of failure behind attempts to establish similar co-ops. During the years following World War II, a succession of failures in consumer cooperative food stores led to a belief that such businesses were almost impossible to operate successfully. Recently very large co-op grocery stores have been successful in some of the northern cities. But the small grocery co-op remains a poor risk. The small grocer necessarily buys in small lots. Often he buys at high wholesale prices, prices which many times exceed the retail prices of chain groceries in the area. The low volume of sales makes it difficult to supply fresh products such as meat, milk, and vegetables to customers. The quality and location of facilities are often poor. The small Negro-owned grocery co-op in a small Black Belt town will undoubtedly lack operating capital, making it difficult for it to offer credit to its customers, and credit has long been the life force of small grocery stores in America.

Some discussion has been given to the possibility of establishing state-wide wholesale co-ops to supply local grocery co-ops with produce at wholesale prices. The cost of such an operation would probably be prohibitive. Trucks, warehouses, and employees all cost money, and should the wholesale cooperative make enough to pay for itself it is doubtful if the individual store owners would make any profit during the first several years. It appears that the problems of small grocery co-ops, even when serviced by a wholesale food cooperative, are considerable enough to label such an endeavor an extremely high risk.

Marketing cooperatives, on the other hand, have long been successful in the United States. Almost one-fourth of all America's farm crops are sold through cooperative marketing associations. Several civil rights groups and one or two independent individuals are presently attempting to establish farm cooperatives around truck crops in Alabama and Mississippi with Negro farmers.

These will be both consumer and marketing cooperatives; the consumer part will provide necessary farm and home supplies to the farmers and the marketing aspect will concern itself with selling the truck crops. Again it seems that perhaps the cooperative idea has been oversold as a means for solving an economic problem and under-explained in regard to the risk and personal involvement it entails. Six or ten Negro farmers in Alabama can gain when they get together to buy fertilizer cheaper or to share the use of a tractor or a combine they own collectively. Such cooperative venture supplies a service, but rarely does it produce a really substantial increase in a farmer's income. Collective marketing of crops by ten, fifteen, or even twenty farmers is a complicated procedure and it involves a fairly high risk. Generally, marketing cooperatives are formed or have been formed to protect farmers against the fluctuations of the speculative market. Without a marketing co-op the farmer is forced to sell his crop -- sometimes to but one or two buyers -- at whatever price the buyer is willing to pay and under whatever conditions the buyer insists upon. Large marketing co-ops supply terminal storage, marketing facilities, and marketing agencies to large numbers of farmers. In this way the farmers, through cooperatives, are able to exert some influence in terms of both quality and price on the buyer. All this sounds very good. The question, however, is whether a group of twenty Negro farmers in Alabama can provide themselves with all the necessities to make such a venture a business success. Where will the capital come from? Who will supply the management skills necessary for success? What will keep the buyers and white farmers from simply treating such a small bargaining unit as just one middle-sized farmer, whose tomatoes or cucumbers "they just don't feel like buying at market price today?" Will the farmers sell all their produce through the marketing co-op or will they be tempted, especially if other members' produce is not as good as theirs, to sell their best produce separately and only their inferior produce through the co-op?

Several questions should be asked of other cooperative efforts under way in the South. Can a gas-oil cooperative servicing only Negro-owned service stations withstand a price war with a major oil company? How long can a co-op making clothing and leather luxury items depend on a "sympathy" market? And is this market large enough to allow the business to expand enough to offer minimum wages, training opportunities, and retirement benefit to its owners, the employees? It should be noted here that with adequate training courses and assistance in the marketing of the finished products self-employment cooperatives such as these offer great promise in that they provide jobs to persons who are unemployed, underemployed, or victims of economic retaliation. Can a state-wide consumer cooperative planned to supply Negroes with all basic living requirements from food to clothing under-sell a national mail order house on everything or even meet their prices on a majority of items? Can they offer easy credit? If such a cooperative did succeed and if it could include all the Negroes in any southern state, would it change the situation appreciably? Could it offer employment, more income, housing, or better education to ex-farm workers? Would a man making $1500 a year find a dividend check of $4.50 at the end of a year and one vote out of 10,000 in the running of the cooperative of enough value to his life to pledge his involvement and loyalty, both of which would be necessary if the co-op is to succeed, to the organization?

A Good Idea is Not Enough

An ideal couched in the greatest moral and social needs of man is not enough to assure the success of a business enterprise. Mr. Jerry Voorhis, executive director of the Cooperative League, says that cooperatives in America have learned a number of lessons since 1950. Among them are several that are especially applicable to this discussion:

1. The day of the small cooperative kept alive by idealism alone is largely past; coordination, federation and merger are necessary. Everything from raw materials..... to consumers must be included.
2. The best method of expansion of cooperatives is from regional cooperatives outward, not in formation of new cooperatives.
3. Good management is of critical importance.

People planning cooperatives might well heed several guidelines for their successful operation.

--- Cooperative managers must do only the job assigned them by the co-op members.

--- Members must be familiar with the business field they are entering and must realize their responsibilities. (Or, members may withdraw, especially if they don't see immediate benefits.)

--- Members often feel that since the business belongs to them they can safely "owe themselves." A private business can select its business risks -- a co-op must treat all members alike.

--- Co-op managers must be good businessmen and good leaders. Training should be a requirement.

--- Local and independent co-ops often suffer problems. Co-ops, when possible, should affiliate with others and with central marketing and supply organizations.

--- Cooperatives must anticipate vigorous attacks by those whose business interests are in conflict with objectives of the cooperative.

--- Because cooperatives are democratically controlled organizations it is often difficult to distinguish between one member, one vote in overall control of the organization (an essential feature in any true cooperative) and attempted "democracy" in management and operations, which is fatal to any business, cooperatives included.

Credit Unions

The growth of credit unions among low-income people, primarily Negroes in the South, has accelerated during the past six months. These, too, are often interpreted as a means to economic power. Their value as a source of money is often emphasized over their purpose of promoting thrift, individual self-help, etc. As with other cooperative efforts, it is necessary to look closely at credit unions to see what they are, and how they can benefit people belonging to them.

Credit unions are cooperative organizations composed of members having a common bond of occupation, residence, or other association. They promote thrift and create a source of credit for their members. Credit unions give to their members the opportunity for regular saving and offer protection of funds -- for they operate under law, supervised by the government, and must supply surety bonds and substantial reserves. Often life insurance benefits are available. Credit unions loan money at low interest rates (usually 1% a month or less) to their members to pay bills, taxes, medical expenses, automobiles, vacations, education, etc. They are often the only place a low-income family can go and obtain a loan at decent terms.

Most federal and state credit unions provide organizational assistance where the applicant group is eligible for a charter and has qualified leadership within it to insure a reasonable chance for successful operation.

Strictly speaking, it is not necessary for credit unions to incorporate. But the advantages of incorporation are great.

The laws generally:

--- require audit by state banking authorities

--- limit the member's liability

--- enable credit unions to sign contracts

--- give legal standing to rights of the credit union and to any member who may appear in court

--- establish chartered and incorporated credit unions as any other banking institution.

How does a credit union of rural Alabama Negroes, or of citizens of a city slum, compare with the majority of credit unions in the U. S.?

The majority of credit union members in the U. S. are industrial employees, government employees, and teachers. Rural based credit unions account for only 3% of U. S. credit unions and for but little more than 1% of total credit union savings. Local community credit unions during the 20's and 30's had such poor records of success that some state supervisory authorities refused to charter community groups. This trend has somewhat disappeared and farm credit unions are now considered good risks.

A Realistic Look

What can low-income people expect of a credit union if it succeeds?

In the U. S. as a whole average savings of credit union members is about $500. Last year loans to individual members of federal credit unions averaged over $750. Credit unions rarely make unsecured loans (by signature only) in excess of $300. Usually they place a limit even on loans with security. A small credit union of 30-40 poor people could not make very large loans. Its primary value would be to allow people to make their own decisions concerning the use of their savings, and to provide a sympathetic board to hear their loan requests. Requests should always be kept in confidence at the risk of members losing faith in the credit union.

Small credit unions made up of low-income people will have problems. As long as credit unions are small and cannot afford to pay for help, they have the perpetual problem of finding volunteer workers who are qualified to manage the affairs of the union. Community credit unions have a reputation of being "stillborn." Stillborn credit unions are those organized with only partial support from the community, or unions which failed to select competent officers or attract sufficient working capital.

Credit unions, then, can lend members small sums at reasonable interest and provide other services such as inexpensive life insurance. That such organizations are badly, if not desperately, needed there is no doubt, but their chances for success hinge on good management, community involvement, and adequate capital. They can obtain help from the Office of Economic Opportunity in grants or loans which allow the beginning credit union to hire a financial manager -- something a credit union cannot ordinarily do until it is several years old. Assistance is also available from state credit union leagues and the Federal Credit Union League. The Credit Union National Association (CUNA) in Madison, Wisconsin, can supply advice and written information, as well as the materials for bookkeeping and other essentials.

A small credit union of poor people cannot do much to change a member's economic position if he is already deeply in debt, or has only a meager income. The spirit of the cooperative action seems of more apparent value than the economic assistance it can give.

SUMMARY

This analysis of cooperative action among poor people, especially poor southern Negroes, has perhaps drawn far more negative conclusions than were intended. Cooperatives, and the ideal of placing human rights and better living above profit motives, are needed in the South. Perhaps the viability of a democracy depends on such cooperative action. There is a danger, however, of thinking of anything done cooperatively as being something sacred, something that can overcome all obstacles.

The question, of course, is how best to achieve economic independence, without which the southern Negro will not be able to wield his considerable political power. It is evident that some people believe that small cooperatives, and still smaller credit unions, can offer low-income people some degree of independence. But, a restriction of the use of the cooperative to a small, almost romantic notion of a community will in all probability sentence it to failure. There is also the inherent danger of dashing and discouraging the cooperative spirit that presently exists, if such small organizations should fail.

Because cooperatives and credit unions are both businesses, if such efforts are to be of real economic benefit in this day of big business, they will have to be large in size and scope. State-wide and regional cooperative endeavors should be considered. Large land cooperatives, featuring housing co-ops and perhaps industry owned by the people themselves, are possibilities. State or regional corporations could offer sizeable loans and provide technical training and marketing assistance to individual self-employment co-ops. Such corporations could be foundation or government subsidized. This would allow the valuable moral and psychological advantages of the cooperative self-help idea to continue while also weighting the odds for economic success in the co-op's favor. Thus, cooperative spirit -- among the very people who need it if they are to survive as individuals with basic human rights -- might succeed and thrive.

Loans designed to utilize credit unions as the vehicle to accomplish the purposes of Section 6.f. "Consumer Information, Education, and Mutual Aid" of the Community Action Guide, Vol. I, February, 1965.

The Applicant Agency

1. Where the official Community Action Program Agency has been designated in a given area, it would serve as the applicant agency.

2. Where the official Community Action Program Agency has not been designated, an existing neighborhood organization, such as a settlement house, might serve as the applicant agency, taking the initiative to bring together leadership representative of the community as a whole. In this case the history and activities of the agency should be described as part of this proposed component.

Purpose of Component

To meet the problems indicated above and to fulfill the objectives of Part C, Section 6.f. of the Community Action Program Guide by expanding existing credit unions or developing new ones:

1. To open up for residents of target areas served by neighborhood centers the opportunity to manage their finances with the same dignity that others enjoy through membership participation in credit union benefits.

2. To provide through the credit union a "money clinic" and a "school for economic literacy" addressing itself actively on a full-time basis to money and credit problems of the people who reside in these neighborhoods.

3. To provide basic thrift and low-cost lending services.

4. To develop consumer education programs for members and potential members.

5. To develop budget and family financial counseling services.

6. To provide a device for the development of leadership and operational skills in a cooperative venture.

Action Plan

To apply the tested approach of supplying a staff unit of three persons to operate the credit union on a full-time basis in each selected neighborhood.

A. 1. Identify the well-defined neighborhood boundaries that will qualify for a credit union charter. Survey the area to determine whether to expand an existing credit union or start a new one.

To be done by the state credit union league in cooperation with the applicant agency. Additionally in all phases of this program the services of CUNA will be made available.

2. Recruit and train indigenous sub-professionals to serve as the credit union operational staff.

To be done by the state credit union league in cooperation with the applicant agency and other neighborhood associations. Training would include on-the-job experience in existing credit unions; participation in existing credit union league and chapter programs; special training sessions geared to special needs of the group to be served.

3. Provide training for the credit union volunteer officials (15) chosen from the neighborhood by fellow residents to serve as credit union board and committee members.

   To be done by state credit union league and the credit union operational staff.

4. Provide guidance and assistance in launching the credit union into operation.

   To be done by state credit union league.

5. Provide continuing advice and counsel for the successful operation of the credit union.

   To be done by state credit union league.

B. Where plans call for establishment of more than one neighborhood center credit union, a Credit Union Project Coordinator-Trainer would be employed. He would be a credit union specialist with field experience who would be involved in all phases of the action plan for each unit.

The Situation in Brief

The city of Louisville, Kentucky, has made notable progress in the elimination of race discrimination, with a minimum of turmoil and with the evident approval of a substantial majority of its citizens of both races. Of its four main desegregation hurdles -- public schools, public accommodations, employment, and housing -- it may be said that the first two have been practically surmounted in that city, the third is being approached with some visible success, and the fourth is the object of an intensive and imaginative and a hopeful effort.

The situation in Louisville has many shortcomings from the standpoint of human understanding and interracial justice. Race prejudice is still present in varying degrees among a majority of that city's white population. A white cab driver, a fat, oldish, talkative individual, launched upon a lengthy monologue from which the following is quoted:

---

> Negroes? Yes we're getting along all right. They can go into almost any place now. But I don't see many of them doing it. Some of them get dressed up and go into the big hotels and restaurants and nobody pays any attention. But the little places don't let them in. They haven't got strong enough locks on their doors. Negroes would ransack the place. Every one of them will steal. Every Negro you see on the street has got a knife or a razor in his pocket, maybe a gun. Did you ever see a Negro drunk? I've seen lots of them -- mean, big-mouthed.... But I ain't got nothing against them, and the way it is they can't do much harm.

This man's views are shared by a substantial element of Louisville's population -- though many would express them differently or not at all. Negroes are excluded from country clubs and civic clubs. White families tend to move away from neighborhoods where Negro families are moving in. Few white people are willing to dine with Negroes in a public place, and only a rare handful invite Negroes to their homes. Much subtle discrimination is practiced. Some Negro leaders say that "integration is a farce in Louisville."

Nevertheless, race prejudice may be said to be contained in this city. It is viewed by the community leadership as an evil to be combatted, and it is being combatted steadily and with increasing effectiveness. The interracial behavior pattern keeps almost entirely within the bounds of order and decorum. Discrimination on account of race is frowned upon in principle -- though still far from being eliminated in practice; it is recognized even by many prejudiced people as inconsistent with Christian and American ideals and out of keeping with the changing order. New advances in racial integration are accepted cheerfully on the whole by the public. The city administration and the economic "power structure" are firmly behind a movement of civil-rights advance, which, not only has registered exceptional accomplishments, but is moving on to further progress.

Basic in the Louisville effort is a consciousness that this social change cannot be accomplished by a few dramatic steps, but demands a massive and continuous undertaking, with the dedicated efforts of many groups and individuals. In efforts of this kind the city is well served. In the private sector, a number of organizations are active -- the principal so-called "Negro" civil rights organizations and many other groups concerned with human relations. Several hundred individuals, in biracial organizations or independently, are giving much of their time to this cause. Yet the role of the public sector in race-relations reform has been particularly striking in Louisville. To an unusual degree initiative has come from the public school administration, mayors, aldermen, the police department, and other city officials and agencies. Since May 1962, an official Louisville Human Relations Commission has marshaled a massive private effort in this field.

Background and Chronology

Though Kentucky is not one of the eleven states which formed the Confederacy, it is the border state most commonly regarded as southern. If that identification is less pronounced today than it was eight years ago, the change is largely due to Kentucky's progress in adjusting to the new order in race relations. Of the state's metropolis it is sometimes said that "Louisville has integrated itself out of the South."

In 1956, at a time when hostility in the South to the Supreme Court decision outlawing public school segregation was at its height, the public schools of Louisville were desegregated in a sweeping manner and without disorder. The late Omer Carmichael, the able and courageous superintendent of schools, to whom the feat was largely due, later collaborated with Weldon James, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, in producing a valuable book, The Louisville Story (Simon and Schuster) telling how it was done.

These writers noted that Louisville "long has had a strong two-party system, with a healthy balance of independent-minded voters." (However, Louisville elected its first Republican mayor in 28 years in 1961.) But the book added "Politics aside, Louisville has faced the South since 1865. Its customs and its outlook have been almost professionally Southern...." At the same time the atmosphere in Louisville for a generation has been one of exceptional tolerance, moving toward liberalism, in race relations. This trend has been immesurably aided by the city's two excellent newspapers (under joint ownership), the morning Courier-Journal and the afternoon Louisville Times, and the administration and faculty of the University of Louisville have exercised a constructive influence.

Louisville elected the first Negro member of the Kentucky legislature, Charles Anderson, in 1934, and the first Negro member of the city's board of aldermen, Eugene S. Clayton, in 1945. Negro alderman William W. Beckett in 1955 served as Acting Mayor of Louisville. Two Negroes, James E. Smith and Arthur Johnson, are among Louisville's representatives in the state legislature now, and two, Mrs. Louise Reynolds and Russell Lee, sit on its board of aldermen, while a Negro, Woodford R. Porter, is a member of its board of education, having served last year as its president. Negroes have served on the library, housing, and other important municipal boards. Two Negroes were members of the 1962-1963 Citizens Committee to Evaluate the Public Schools. A distinguished Louisville Negro, Dr. C. H. Parrish of the University of Louisville, was recently appointed to the 50-member Kentucky Constitutional Revision Assembly.

The following moves preceded the 1956 school desegregation:

1948: The Louisville Free Public Library (downtown unit) was opened to Negroes. (The library branches were opened to Negroes in 1952. Since 1959, a Negro lady, Mrs. Barbara S. Miller, has served as director of children's work for the public library system.)

1950: The new Louisville Catholic college, Bellarmine, was opened to Negroes as well as whites, and Negroes were admitted to graduate study at the University of Louisville. The Louisville police were provided with a manual to promote racial tolerance and impartiality.

1951: Negro undergraduates were admitted to the University of Louisville.

1952: Public golf courses were desegregated following court action.

1953: The General Hospital School of Nursing was opened to Negro girls.

1954: Mayor Andrew Broaddus in his inaugural statement announced in January that city jobs would be open to all qualified applicants without regard to race.

1955: City swimming pools were integrated, quietly and without prior public notice.

1957: The Municipal Housing Commission announced desegregation of its housing projects. Some downtown hotels desegregated partially.

1958: Early sit-ins resulted in the desegregation of lunch counters in a few downtown variety stores.

The civil rights movement received new impetus with the wave of sit-ins which began in the South during the spring of 1960 and reached spectacular proportions in Louisville in 1961.

Louisville has long been free from the type of demagogic appeal to race prejudice which has plagued many southern cities, and the race question in that sense has not for a generation been an issue in Louisville politics. It figured, however, in a positive sense in the city election of 1961. Although steady progress had been made under three Democratic administrations, a belief that Republican candidates were more committed to take a leap forward in the fight against race discrimination was a factor in the election of a Republican mayor and board of aldermen. After the election, William S. Milburn, the defeated Democratic candidate for mayor, then president of the board of aldermen, commented aptly: "We came along at the end of an era and got squeezed in the gap when it closed."

Three months after taking office, on March 27, 1962, with the backing of Mayor William O. Cowger, the board of aldermen unanimously adopted an ordinance setting up a Louisville Human Relations Commission. On May 14, 1963, the board of aldermen adopted an ordinance, submitted by the Commission, banning discrimination in places of public accommodation.

School Desegregation

Although the problem of school desegregation was met with sensational success in 1956, it is appropriate to glance briefly at the school situation in Louisville today.

Of the 50,249 pupils in the city's public schools, 19,366, or 38.5%, are Negroes. The number of pupils attending integrated schools is 41,490, or 82.6% of the total. Only 8.6% of the pupils are in all-white schools, 12.5% in all-Negro schools. The figures tend to give an exaggerated impression of the extent of integration, since three predominantly white schools have only one Negro each in attendance and two predominantly Negro schools have each enrolled only one white pupil. However, 58 of the 71 public schools are integrated and the racial balance is generally substantial.

"De facto" segregation, now a subject of controversy in many cities, is present in Louisville in a number of instances, but it is mitigated in a sense by a liberal transfer privilege. Transfers are granted by informal arrangement within the capacities of the schools and with regard for preferences and conveniences of other parents and children; though not officially intended to do so, these informal arrangements do undoubtedly permit some adjustment to social preferences, but of Negroes as well as whites. Transfers are not permitted to crowd out any pupils in the residential area of a school. Pupils are not "bussed across town", however, to achieve a racial balance in schools, or for any other reason; except in unusual cases, free transportation is not provided for a pupil attending a school outside his district of residence.

The transfer privilege does not markedly diminish the racial imbalance in schools, but it permits some freedom of choice for both white and colored pupils. It may affect the racial balance either way, and whites and Negroes both contribute to the degree of de facto segregation that results from it. Louisville's Central High School, in a heavily Negro residential area, is a conspicuous case in point. The handful of whites living in its neighborhood generally send their children to another school. At the same time, Central High, one of Louisville's newest and best schools, is especially popular with Negroes and draws Negro pupils from outside its attendance district.

At present 127 Negro teachers are serving in integrated faculties, and nine Negro principals preside over biracial schools. Two Negroes serve as supervisors in the central office of the public school administration.

The racial pattern of the public school system is not a source of serious complaint among Negroes nor a part of their agenda of protest in Louisville.

The public schools of adjoining Jefferson County were also desegregated in 1956, as were the Roman Catholic parochial schools of the Louisville area. The Catholic school enrollment is approximately 28% of the total school population of city and county. The Louisville school district census shows 16,472 pupils enrolled in private and parochial schools. The integration of Negro teachers in the Catholic schools has presented a special problem due to the difficulty of obtaining qualified Negro lay personnel at the low compensation offered and the lack of Negro nuns, but seven Negro lay teachers are now employed.

The Sit-Ins and the Louisville Police

A few sit-ins which occurred in the latter half of 1960 and the large scale Negro drive to open places of public accommodation which came in March 1961 were both a part of the new wave of Negro militancy and a reflection of impatience on the part of Louisville Negroes with many aspects of race discrimination. They resulted in the opening of 200 previously white-only eating places to Negroes, and caused the city to come to grips with the race problem in many of its ramifications.

The 1961 protest demonstrations which were staged almost daily for several weeks and sporadically for a longer period, took a variety of forms of marching, picketing, and sitting in. Scuffles occurred with police seeking to prevent obstruction of traffic and flagrant disorder, and with some white hoodlums. An estimated 1,000 arrests were made, but, many being arrested repeatedly, the number of individuals arrested was fewer than 500. The cases of all the demonstrators arrested were dismissed after negotiations. White harassment of the demonstrators was largely confined to a handful of youths who made repeated attempts to break the Negro picket line at an amusement park. A dozen of these whites were arrested and several were fined.

Massive Negro protest demonstrations were a new phenomenon for the Louisville police force, but its performance in this crisis is not a source of serious complaint in retrospect even in Negro quarters. (The behavior of some privately employed security officers aroused more criticism.) In routine law enforcement pains have been taken to school the city's police force in the avoidance of race discrimination, and it has made an important, though little publicized, contribution to the peaceful progress of Louisville in adjustment to the new order.

The Division of Police, in 1950, published a hardcover, 129-page manual, titled Principles of Police Work with Minority Groups. Adapted from a Chicago manual prepared by Dr. Joseph D. Lohman, Chairman of the Illinois Division of Correction, the book contains a comprehensive and scholarly discussion of the race problem. It explodes some of the myths upon white race prejudice is often based, and then directs that whatever "personal theories on race relations" he may have, the officer must be completely impartial in the performance of his duties. The manual is still in regular use. For example, Colonel William E. Bender, Chief of Police, commented that "15 recruits are studying it now."

The manual project arose from a study instituted by Colonel David A. McCandless, Director of Public Safety, in 1948, following a conference with a delegation from the Urban League. A biracial committee was set up in that year to plan for the training of Louisville police in the application of the precepts of good race relations to police functioning. The committee included six representatives of the Police Division, two representatives of the Urban League, a professor of sociology from the Louisville Municipal College, and three members of the faculty of the University of Louisville. Many meetings were held by the committee before Dr. Lohman was called in as a consultant, and, after the resignation of Colonel McCandless in January 1950, it continued under the leadership of the new commissioner, John Moreman.

Colonel McCandless became director of the Southern Police Institute, sponsored by the University of Lousiville.

Three representatives of the Louisville police force attend each of the four seminars held annually by the Institute.

Negroes have served as policemen in Louisville for 35 years. Thirty-eight Negroes are now on the force, one of them being a lieutenant and four of them sergeants.

Places of Public Accommodation

A few restaurants, drug stores, lunch counters, and hotels in Louisville were already serving Negroes along with whites in the late 1950's, but segregation was the general rule. Attention was drawn to the practice in an embarrassing manner by an incident which occurred in December 1958, when Mrs. Iris King, the mayor of Kingston, Jamaica, visited the city as a guest of the State Department. Mrs. King stayed in the presidential suite at the Sheraton Hotel and received generally VIP treatment. But a local drug store refused to serve her a cup of coffee. She retired to her hotel in tears, calling it a "gross insult." In the absence of Mayor Bruce Hoblitzell from the city, an administrative assistant expressed regret for the "unfortunate incident" -- which remained unfortunate nonetheless. An official of the drug store said its policy was to give "carry-out service only for colored customers" -- which made matters emphatically no better.

The determined Negro drive to bring discrimination to an end in places of public accommodation may be said to have begun in 1959, though direct action pressure was not resorted to on a significant scale until 1961. Many white community leaders, including the mayor and members of the board of aldermen, expressed sympathy with the Negro drive, but hoped the reform could be accomplished by voluntary action. These attitudes themselves had prompted some voluntary desegregation here and there.

The late Charles W. Anderson, Jr., a distinguished Negro attorney and a member of the United States delegation to the United Nations Assembly, led a delegation of 35 Negroes and whites who visited Mayor Bruce Hoblitzell on January 4, 1960. Anderson praised Louisville's "excellent race relations, particularly as compared to other southern and border cities" and urged the mayor to "take the lead in seeing that theatres, hotels, restaurants, stores, and other places of public service and accommodations cease to discriminate or segregate." Mayor Hoblitzell replied that Louisville had reached "a most enviable position" by its race relations accomplishment and that the city had done all that could be done to end discrimination in public facilities, but that "trying to force integration in private business is another matter."

Meanwhile, on February 10, William W. Beckett, the only Negro member of the board of aldermen, introduced a proposed ordinance banning discrimination in theatres, hotels, and restaurants, but not in bars or taverns. After the City Law Department ruled that the city could "not pass any laws in conflict with constitutional guarantees of private property," the ordinance was rejected by voice vote. Alderman Clifford J. Haury, who had read the opinion, said: "I sincerely believe and hope that the good people of Louisville will iron out this problem voluntarily."

The Louisville Courier-Journal commented: "The issue was not squarely met ... the issue of further integration in Louisville is for the moment at a standstill. It could now move forward again, by voluntary choice of the community, or it could slip tragically backward...."

Alderman Beckett, insisting that a general lifting of racial barriers would not come by voluntary action, asked State Attorney General John B. Breckinridge for an opinion on his ordinance. A few weeks later the state attorney general ruled that "there is no conflict between the proposed ordinance and the Constitutions and laws of the United States and the Commonwealth, and the subject matter being within the police power of the state and the city of Louisville, it is our opinion that, if adopted, it would constitute a valid exercise of police power."

However, following a caucus at which letters and telegrams from opposing businessmen were read, the board of aldermen on March 22, by a vote of 11 to 1, approved the following resolution:

"We, the board of aldermen of the city of Louisville, are opposed to any ordinance which takes away the right of an owner of a private business to select his or its customers or clientele."

Beckett also urged the establishment of a human relations commission for the city, but this proposal was rejected by a vote of 11 to 1, opposing aldermen saying that it would "substantially duplicate the work of the state commission."

Alarmed at the continuing sit-ins in the South, the City Law Department now came forward with a proposed anti-trespassing ordinance. However, when this was vehemently opposed by Negro leaders, the city's two daily newspapers and others, both the police court prosecutor and Mayor Hoblitzell announced their opposition to it.

The biracial Louisville Ministerial Association took a strong stand against racial segregation in theatres and restaurants. It urged its members to seek voluntary desegregation by persuasion in personal contacts with businessmen, but it pledged support for a public accommodations ordinance should such efforts fail. The Mayor's Advisory Committee on Human Relations announced that it "considered any racial discrimination contrary to the public interest."

In conveying the Committee's finding to the board of aldermen, Mayor Hoblitzell expressed agreement, but reiterated his opposition to "any kind of force."

The Mayor's Advisory Committee represented a stage in the groping toward an official body to deal with race relations, which had begun with the formation of an advisory group of religious leaders in 1958. It grew into more formal status in May 1961, as the Mayor's Committee on Human Relations, under the chairmanship of Dr. Philip W. Davidson, president of the University of Louisville.

With the sit-ins and other pressures, considerable voluntary desegregation of places of public accommodation had taken place by the end of 1961, but Louisville Negroes were increasingly irked by the failure of the board of aldermen to adopt a public accommodations ordinance or set up a human relations commission. Numerous groups and individuals were now urging anti-discrimination legislation, including several owners of segregated restaurants who felt the need of an ordinance to protect them from criticism and from competition when they should take the step.

The Louisville Human Relations Commission was finally set up in May 1962. The ordinance establishing it was expressly aimed at the elimination of "discriminatory practices", and the Commission was directed to recommend "such legislation as may be necessary" for this purpose. The new commission, and the mayor himself, labored diligently -- and with some success -- to bring about desegregation of still segregated places of public accommodation. A survey showed that 268 of 410 restaurants in the city had desegregated by early 1963.

However, on February 9, 1963, the Commission adopted a resolution saying: "It is now evident that voluntary efforts by themselves are not sufficient to effectively accomplish the purposes set forth in the ordinance which established the Commission. Therefore, the Commission has decided to recommend to the mayor and the board of aldermen, the passage of appropriate anti-discrimination legislation, the nature and scope of which will be determined in the near future." A sub-committee of the Commission's Legal Committee, including the chairman and the director of the City Law Department, went to work on an ordinance which was adopted by the board of aldermen on May 14, 1963, and signed by Mayor Cowger.

The ordinance was to run into legal difficulties and its status is not clear today, but the fact that a law had been passed banning segregation in places of public accommodation was effective in accelerating the desegregation of many establishments.

A survey made by the Human Relations Commission before the adoption of the ordinance in May found that accommodations in the chain and franchise category were "generally open with the exception of two establishments... under single local ownership." The Commission reported further:

1. Approximately 65% of all restaurants are integrated; of the remaining 35%, few seem likely to desegregate in the near future.
2. The better restaurants downtown accept the Negro as a patron, as do the short order cafes and chain store facilities.
3. The Negro will encounter segregation in the better restaurants in outlying areas.
4. Near his home, only one out of five restaurants will serve the Negro.
5. When he is served he is treated the same as a white person.
6. Whites seem indifferent to his presence in the restaurant and apparently are equally indifferent to his being refused service.
7. Most managers state their policy of segregation dispassionately.

Bowling lanes the Commission found to be "the most tightly closed category of services in Louisville." Privately-owned amusement parks, ice and roller skating rinks were "generally tightly closed." All downtown theaters and two of the three drive-ins within the city limits, but only a few of the neighborhood theaters, were integrated. The previously segregated Louisville Automobile Club, following conferences within the month, had begun actively to solicit Negro membership -- with the understanding that reservations could not be made in southern states.

The public accommodations ordinance (No. 66, Series 1963) became effective, 120 days after its passage, on September 12, 1963. Promptly at the lunch hour on September 12, a testing campaign began. Frank L. Stanley, Jr., chairman of Allied Organizations for Civil Rights and editor of the Louisville Defender, reported that within a few hours 73 Negroes, acting individually or as husband-and-wife teams, entered 49 restaurants "without objection or rejection." Restaurants "received Negroes courteously and served them promptly," Stanley said, adding: "These restaurants are to be congratulated, along with the bowlers association (the Bowling Proprietors' Association of Louisville) ... for their acceptance of desegregation." A total of 98 restaurants were visited in the initial testing period, with negative results in only three cases.

Four tavern operators, members of the Louisville Tavern Operators Association, filed suit in a circuit court asking that the authorities be restrained from enforcing the ordinance on the ground that "the plaintiffs have a constitutional right to restrict their customers to such persons as they see fit to serve, and to refuse service to anyone for any reason." The case is still in litigation, but to a large extent the ordinance has done its work. Although, pending the outcome of the litigation, the Commission is unable to enforce the punitive provisions of the ordinance, it is following the situation closely and several recalcitrant restaurants have been persuaded informally to comply with it. In no instance has a restaurant, once desegregated, returned to the practice of barring Negroes.

The Human Relations Commission

We come now to an examination of the Louisville Human Relations Commission itself, its organizational structure and its program.

The ordinance establishing the Commission (No. 33, Series 1962) set forth the reasons for it and its purpose as follows:

> Whereas, the Board of Aldermen and the Mayor of the City of Louisville find that prejudice and the practice of discrimination against any individual or group because of race, creed, color, or national origin, is contrary to good public policy and detrimental to the peace, progress, and welfare of the City, and
> Whereas, the lack of full participation of any individual in the privileges of full membership in the community retards the progress of the community, and affects the general well-being of all its citizens,

Whereas, for these reasons and to implement a constructive approach to the problems involved in improving inter-group and inter-racial relations leading to the elimination of discriminatory practices in the City,...

The commission was to be composed of eleven residents (later increased to 15), appointed by the mayor, as "nearly as possible representative of the several social, economic, religious, cultural, ethnic and racial groups which comprise the population of the city of Louisville." No city official, elected or appointed, is eligible. Commission members serve, without compensation, for one year, except in the case of an interim vacancy, when a member may be appointed to fill the unexpired term, and members are eligible for re-appointment for additional terms. The mayor designates the member to act as chairman. The Commission is required, with the approval of the mayor, to employ an executive director, whose compensation is fixed by the mayor.

The executive director, with the mayor's approval and within the limits of his budget, employs staff and fixes its compensation. The Commission was voted an initial annual operating budget of $25,000; its current operating budget is $26,055.80. It occupies offices in the Mayor's suite in City Hall, the only agency in such proximity to the city executive.

There is general satisfaction with the plan embodied in Ordinance No. 33, a copy of which will be found in the appendix, but the chairman and others suggested that in principle it might be preferable to have Commission members appointed for staggered terms to insure greater continuity of experience and policy during changes of administration.

Of the original eleven members of the Commission, eight were white and three Negro. The enlarged 15-member body contains eleven white and four Negro members. In appointments to the Commission and to its various committees it is sought to have the three major faiths, Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish, represented in each group.

Dr. Marlin M. Volz, dean of the University of Louisville Law School, was designated chairman of the Commission. A treasurer and a secretary and such other officers as are deemed necessary are elected by the Commission. James A. Crumlin, a Negro attorney for the Kentucky NAACP, was chosen treasurer and Mrs. William Florsheim, secretary; the Rt. Rev. Alfred F. Horrigan, president of Bellarmine College, was elected vice-chairman. These three, together with the Rev. D. E. King, a Negro clergyman, form the Commission's executive committee.

Mansir Tydings, executive director of the Lincoln Foundation and a veteran of race relations work, was engaged as executive director of the Commission. His staff now consists of Arthur Evans, assistant executive director, and Mrs. Erma B. Coleman, secretary-treasurer. Both of these are Negroes.

In addition to the Commission a broad apparatus of Associated Committees was set up to carry forward the campaign against race discrimination in its many phases. During the summer of 1962 the Commission was chiefly engaged in enlisting community leaders to serve on these committees; by October, 180 had rallied to the undertaking. Approximately 200, about evenly divided between whites and Negroes, are now serving. Committee members include the directors of the employment and housing committees of the NAACP and the executive director and two other members of the Urban League.

Eleven Associated Committees were formed to work in the following areas: education, employment, housing, public accommodations, supportive community organizations, religious groups, institutions and agencies, professional advisory (legal),programming, research, and communications.

Associated Committee appointments are made by a letter from the mayor in each case, after informal consultation. Following the adoption of Ordinance No. 66, the Public Accommodations Committee was replaced by an Anti-Discrimination Division. The Research Committee was also later replaced by a General Advisory Committee, and the Institutions and Agencies Committee has been dissolved, some of its members being transferred to other committees, while a new Women's Committee for Civil Rights has been formed.

The Commission meets regularly once a month, and its executive committee meets on call. The Associated Committees have regular monthly meeting days, and sometimes meet more often, with the exception of the General Advisory Committee, which meets semi-annually with the Commission and the Associated Committees for an overall review of the Commission's work. Its members are available for counsel at other times. A newspaper reporter attends every Commission meeting.

One is likely to be skeptical of a system which relies upon so many citizens to engage without compensation in any sustained altruistic endeavor. The Associated Committees plan seems, however, to be working. It may be the most valuable feature of Louisville's effort in the race-relations field. Not all committee members are active; about half of them give little time to this work. But the fact that 200 respected citizens are committed in this manner to the elimination of race discrimination is a powerful influence. An estimated 100 Associated Committee members are very active indeed; they are rendering unflagging service in the many complex and often delicate phases of the battle against discrimination.

Actually, the ideal of interracial justice tends to make crusaders out of many who are imbued with it, but a dynamic and infectious enthusiasm on the part of its leaders is essential to the cohesion and success of so large a group of volunteers. This quality is not lacking among the leaders of the Louisville Human Relations Commission. It is present to a superlative degree in Dr. Volz, its chairman. Mr. Tydings brings also to the position of executive director a high degree of good-humored tact, which his duties of administrator and negotiator require.

When an official human relations agency is set up by a city or state government, the suspicion often arises that it is for appearances only and that it may be used even to frustrate Negro objectives. This view is not seriously held of the Louisville Commission in any quarter. As elsewhere, Negro leaders in Louisville are reluctant to express satisfaction with, or even approval of, the accomplishments of their community in civil rights. It is considered bad form or un-militant. "Moderates" are unpopular among many Negroes. However, even aggressive Negro leaders agree privately that Louisville is making exceptional progress in civil rights, that "the thing is moving" in that city. The Louisville Human Relations Commission, they say, is "making an honest effort." Lyman T. Johnson, president of the Louisville chapter of the NAACP and a veteran of civil rights struggles, is less reserved than most in this regard and is sometimes labelled a "moderate" for that reason. Johnson was active in earlier demonstrations, but has used his influence to prevent further demonstrations since the work of the Commission has gotten under way.

The establishing ordinance gave the Commission a scope broad enough to embrace the objectives of civil rights organizations themselves. Its charter said: "The Commission shall cooperate with Federal, state and other city agencies in an effort to develop harmonious inter-group and interracial relations and shall endeavor to enlist the support of civic, religious, labor, industrial and commercial groups and civic leaders dedicated to the improvement of inter-group and interracial relations and the elimination of discriminatory practices." Louisville thus recognized this endeavor as a matter of concern to the city, and it has brought the civil rights movement largely into the framework of public administration.

After the completion of the organizational structure of the Commission and its Associated Committees, late in 1962, a word should be said about the manner of its embarking upon its task. According to its first-year report, "in less than six months the Associated Committees had held 76 meetings. The Commission had had 27 meetings, of which 16 were with groups of citizens interested in knowing more about the Commission's objectives, as well as with business groups whose cooperation was sought for the removal of discriminatory practices. There were meetings with the Louisville Restaurant Association, theatre-owners, proprietors of bowling lanes, directors of secretarial schools, and similar groups. In a number of instances the mayor has participated personally, applying the prestige of his office and his convictions by writing letters, by issuing invitations to conferences, and by leading discussions in several of the meetings."

In establishing its alliance with private human-relations groups and agencies, the Commission's report continued: "A series of weekly conferences were held with individuals and with representatives of the Kentucky Council on Human Relations, Inc., the Lincoln Foundation, Inc., Louisville Urban League, National Conference of Christians and Jews, Kentucky Civil Liberties Union, Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), Conference of Jewish Organizations, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and the American Friends Service Committee. Members of these organizations now actively participate as members of the Associated Committees...."

To learn from the experience of other similar bodies, the Commission devoted one full meeting to a conference with the executive directors of the Mayor's Friendly Relations Committee of Cincinnati and the Kentucky Commission on Human Rights. On February 9, 1963, there was held at the University of Louisville an all-day work-shop meeting of the Commission and its Associated Committees, attended also by the mayor and nine members of the board of aldermen. The executive director of the Kansas City Human Relations Commission served as a consultant at this meeting. Incidentally, all of the committees of the work-shop, on the basis of their experience in seeking voluntary action, recommended suitable legislation for the removal of racial barriers.

The Commission has since settled down to a routine of operation -- or as much of "settling-down" and as much of "routine" as the dynamic and changing situation permits. The more we delve into the problem of race relations, the more we are impressed with its magnitude and complexity. As the Commission's report said, "the more there is of personal involvement in this important task, the more it is apparent that there is much yet to be done."

Employment

A number of observers remarked that "the Commission is doing its best job in the employment field."

The public sector had already a good record in the matter of equal employment opportunity when the Commission was established. Apart from the integrated school administration, 23 % of the city department jobs are held by Negroes and only about half of these are employed in non-skilled capacities. The police and fire departments are both integrated. The mayor's receptionist is a Negro lady. Judge J. Earl Dearing, who presides over the night court division of the police court, is a Negro and a former NAACP president. Charles J. Lunderman, Jr., assistant city attorney, and James A. Crumlin, traffic court prosecutor, are both Negroes. Other Negroes in public office in Louisville were mentioned earlier.

It is in the field of employment in private business now that the most intensive efforts are being made and most conspicuous results are being accomplished. In this endeavor a busy and efficient Louisville Urban League, under the able direction of Charles T. Steele, collaborates closely and constantly with the Commission and its Employment Committee. The Commission and the Urban League have been busy identifying Negroes in the ranks of elevator operators, janitors, and even floor-sweepers who are qualified for employment at higher levels, and have been successful in securing the upgrading of many.

The Commission recently conducted a survey of employment integration in 26 leading stores, whose owners and managers were 1963 officers and directors of the Retail Merchants Association and the Retail Division of the Chamber of Commerce. These 26 stores employ a total of 3,304 persons, of whom 396, or 11.7% are Negroes. Of the latter, 299 or 75.5% are employed in the humble capacities in which Negroes traditionally served; 97, or 24.5%, now have supervisory or other superior positions. In non-traditional job categories, Negroes were reported as follows: department manager, three; sales supervisor, one; maintenance shop foreman, three; bookkeeper, one; cashier, one; office or clerical worker, ten; sales clerk, 21; price-marker, ten; fitter (men's clothing), six; sign-painter or window-dresser, eight; department clerk, 15; wrapper, ten; appliance repairman, three; customer service assistant, one; and security officer, one.

None of the Negroes employed in the drive, which began last August, in the 26 stores under survey has proven unsatisfactory in his new duties, though one man has been called up for military service. A department store recently asked for 15 Negro high school graduates to be trained for clerical positions. Two Negroes are now serving as bank tellers and two more are in training for this position.

The Courier Journal has one Negro reporter.

In the field of industrial employment accurate surveys are not available, but comparable progress is being made. Arthur M. Walters, industrial secretary of the Urban League, is a member of the Human Relations Commission's Employment Committee and the two groups collaborate diligently in negotiations with both management and labor to secure better jobs for Negroes. The League maintains a regular register of job and apprenticeship opportunities and of Negroes seeking placement. The task of matching qualifications with openings is a principal activity. A number of Negroes are now employed as assistant personnel directors, time study engineers, and in other superior positions. Rufus Stout, personnel manager at the Air Reduction and National Carbide Corporation plant, is a Negro.

The Commission has prepared, for early publication, a directory of employment opportunities and of training programs available to Negroes in Louisville. It is recognized that long exclusion from the better jobs has left many Negroes deficient in the experience and education required for the positions that are now open to them. Consequently, present planning includes night classes and other vocational instruction for Louisville youth of both races. The Employment Committee and the Education Committee collaborate in this field. The Education Committee has a subcommittee for job training and another subcommittee seeking to reduce school drop-outs and raise the aspirations of Negro youth. The Commission has recommended that a separate Youth Commission be established to coordinate the efforts of existing organizations, and the schools, in this field.

A great deal remains to be done before the doors of employment are freely open to Negroes throughout the city, but a substantial entering wedge has been made. Though continued prodding will be necessary, something like a trend has been established.

Housing

The population changes registered in the Louisville area by the census figures of 1950 and 1960 indicate a movement of whites to the suburbs and of Negroes to the city. During the ten-year period the white population of adjoining Jefferson County grew from 125,486 to 220,308, while the Negro population of the city proper increased from 57,657 to 70,075. However, the number of whites within the city limits increased at the same time from 311,472 to 320,190 and the Negro population of the county increased from 4,858 to 8,275. Many well-to-do white families moved from city to county, but there are some signs now of a return trend: a new 28-story apartment building just opening is drawing some of these families back to the city, and a contemplated housing development on the river front is expected to bring more.

The problem of housing or neighborhood desegregation -- the most widely encountered and in a sense the most baffling of all problems in the race relations field -- is centered in Louisville around a large residential area within the city limits known as the West End. At an earlier period the residents of this section were nearly all white. The influx of Negroes began during the housing boom after World War II, when many white residents moved to suburban homes and Negroes in better-paying jobs than before began moving into the vacated West End houses. The trend has continued and accelerated since, as is shown by the 1950-1960 figures for several West End census tracts: in tract No. 10, the Negro population rose from 1,457 to 3,270; in tract No. 11 it increased from 222 to 2,325; and in tract No. 12, from 177 to 1,460.

The West End is still predominantly white. If the racial elements were distributed and the pattern were stabilized the situation would be wholesome. What gives cause for alarm is the continuing trend -- whites moving away and Negroes moving in, and solid blocks of Negro homes developing. "Block-busting" tactics have been observed at times; they have not been in evidence in recent months, but similar influences have operated in a subtler manner. Most realtors express a willingness to cooperate with the Human Relations Commission; a past president of the Louisville Real Estate Board and two other realtors are members of its Housing Committee. The State Real Estate Commission, at the instance of the Louisville Commission, has condemned tactics tending to promote panic selling.

But the problem is infinitely complex. For instance, many Negroes desire homes in the West End and many of them are unmindful of the danger of turning the area into a ghetto. In these circumstances the duty of the real estate agent is not always clear to him; Negro realtors themselves feel obligated to satisfy the wishes of their customers.

The question also arises of where else the Negro can go to escape from the crowded old Negro quarters of the city. In the scattered white residential districts and the fashionable East End Negroes are generally unwelcome. Pressures are sometimes used to deter them. Lending agencies formerly refused loans to Negroes for the purchase of homes in these areas, and, though this practice has ostensibly ceased, it is said to be difficult still for a Negro to obtain credit for the purchase of a home in a white neighborhood.

The desires and conveniences of individual Negro families pose difficulties which underline the close relationship of the housing problem to the whole pattern of prejudice and segregation in a community. Not only do many Negroes object to being pioneers in an unfriendly neighborhood, but the location of available houses is often inconvenient for them. The older Negro residential areas and the center of Negro social and civic activities are nearer the West End. A well-to-do Negro physician found an available home in the East End too far from his practice.

The Commission's Housing Committee and allied human relations groups are attacking the problem of finding suitable houses for Negroes outside of the West End, with steady success here and there. One dedicated white lady is in the real estate business with the sole aim of finding suitable non-West End homes for Negro families in places where they will be contented and where their presence will tend to break down the barriers of prejudice.

Meanwhile, the campaign to bring about a friendly assimilation of the Negro contingent in the West End community and prevent departure of white residents is a chief activity in the race relations field. The effort is aided by the relatively high cultural and economic level of the Negro new-comers. The educational status of West End Negroes, as reflected in the 1960 census is interesting in this regard. The Census Tract 11, where the white population was 3,190 and the Negro population 2,325, the median school grades completed by Negroes 25 years of age and older was 11.3 compared with only 10.7 median school grades completed by the total adult population. In the same age category in Tract 10, the median school grades completed by Negroes was 10.6 and by the total population 9.7.

The direct attack upon the West End problem is centered in the West End Community Council, of which Dr. George B. Kimbrough is an energetic leader. This organization was launched last August, with the desegregation at the same time of the local Y. W. C. A., which became its headquarters. It is aided by the Commission and other human relations groups, notably a Catholic organization, the Christian Family.

Biracial block meetings are being held and couples and teams, with representatives of both races, are going from house to house to further the integrated community idea. "I know of instances where 'For Sale' signs have come down," Dr. Kimbrough said, "after families living in the homes have met some of their Negro neighbors." "Not For Sale" signs have been distributed and many of these have been posted by whites with good psychological effect. In one five-block section "Not for Sale" signs have been posted in front of nearly every house. Many white residents have also posted a sign saying simply: "We Welcome You."

A folder entitled, "Well, I'm Not Moving," prepared by the Community Council and published with financial help from the Human Relations Commission, has been distributed to West End homes. The sub-heads in the folder's text are illustrative of its appeal: "This is a Good Place to Live"; "We Won't Lose Money If We Stay"; "In Fact, We'll Make Money If We Don't Move"; "Maybe It's All A Hoax"; "And We Prefer an Integrated Neighborhood", and "Will You Help Us Build a Community?" A series of films is being shown of the same tenor.

In a survey of a section of the West End, conducted March 21, 1964 by the Community Council, 406 white families were visited. Thirty-nine said they definitely intend to move, 29 were undecided, and 17 refused to be interviewed; but 321 said they planned to stay, and 172 expressed an interest in joining the Community Council.

The campaign is proceeding with genuine enthusiasm on the part of a large group, and in April 1964 was still gathering momentum. The West End Community Council meets twice monthly: 110 had attended its last meeting. "We are only now getting into full swing," Dr. Kimbrough says.

Planning for Future

The tendency of the Louisville Human Relations

Commission, its Associated Committees, and the allied private organizations is not to taper off, but to expand to meet the formidable remaining problems in the city's race relations. Planning for the future has a large part in the movement's activity and concern.

The Commission's 1962-1963 report said with reference to the public accommodations ordinance that it is "mindful that similar remedies should be applied particularly in the areas of employment and housing." It added that though "these problem areas are much more complex and confront long-established customs based on a heritage of prejudice," its "experiences have already borne out that in due course the people of Louisville will accept the challenge of the changes involved." The Commission is studying legislation to promote equal employment opportunity and open housing.

Elaborate planning is being directed to the problems of youth and community improvement. As Negroes comprise a disproportionate number of the underprivileged, work in these areas has important bearing upon race relations and the problem of equal opportunity.

The underprivileged Negro has long suffered from a vicious circle in which poverty, squalor, and ignorance increase the prejudice against him and the same race prejudice deprives him of the opportunity to escape from those afflictions. On the other hand, education and a clean wholesome environment for Negroes tend to open doors that were formerly closed to them, including the door of economic progress in which these advantages can be increasingly enjoyed. Education and vocational training are necessary to enable Negroes to qualify for many of the better-paying jobs to which their race itself is no longer a barrier. Hence a broad program of advance in these areas is essential to a solution of the race problem. In Louisville, this kind of program is supported by the same individuals and agencies engaged in the direct attack upon race discrimination.

In August 1963, a biracial commission of approximately 65 men and women was appointed by the mayor and the county judge to consider the need for a Commission on Children and Youth for Louisville and Jefferson County. The executive director of the Human Relations Commission was prominent in this undertaking. This body, which rendered its report on February 24, 1964, was "unable to recommend an overall commission encompassing all the problems of youth," but it urged improved services for youth through the coordination -- and some consolidation -- of services to youth being provided by existing local and state public agencies, such as the Crime Prevention Bureau of the Louisville Police Department, the Jefferson County Juvenile Court, the Children's Home, and the Welfare Department, the Kentucky Department of Child Welfare, etc. The study commission recommended further that "full support" should be given to a proposal known as "Futures Unlimited," and to a plan of the Louisville Board of Education for a school-neighborhood project in an area of the city producing major problems of youth. The board of education program is to start with the school and reach out to parents, neighborhood agencies, the juvenile court, the welfare department, the library, the recreation department, and other agencies.

"Futures Unlimited" is a project advanced by the Health and Welfare Council, a body made up of representatives of organizations participating in the Community Chest. This project is also co-sponsored by the mayor, the county judge, and the city board of education. It has not been adopted; controversy has arisen over administrative and other details and it is unlikely to be embraced in its present form. It is interesting, nonetheless, as indicating activities envisioned for the future, and in part already under way, in Louisville.

The Health and Welfare Council's memorandum of January 19, 1964 describes Futures Unlimited as, "A Plan to Assure a Future Unlimited for Youth, the Family, and the Neighborhood in Communities Bordering on Urban Renewal Areas." It states: "The general purpose is to improve the level of living in sections of the city fringing upon urban renewal and redevelopment areas, utilizing this change in the physical environment as the opportunity for human renewal as well...." In order to observe results of the contemplated program, "two areas of the most deteriorated central part of the city will be designated as 'Target Areas' A and B, which will in effect be laboratories for testing new and improved social work, educational and community organization methods...."

While these plans embrace the whole population of the designated areas, the population there is largely Negro and the objectives are closely related to the problems of equal opportunity in housing and employment and of the harmonious development of biracial communities. Some figures from the 1960 census on the comparative condition of white and Negro homes in Louisville are pertinent here: 88.2 % of the white population was found to be living in "sound" housing units; only 59.7 % of the Negro population was so housed. Twelve and four-tenths per cent of the whites and 28.4 % of the Negroes were living in "deteriorating" housing units.

Eleven and nine-tenths per cent of the Negroes, but only 2.6% of the whites, had "dilapidated" homes.

The Health and Welfare Council's report notes that during the past year three neighborhood councils, or "block clubs" (self-improvement citizen organizations) have been initiated "with help from the Health and Welfare Council staff, the Louisville Urban League, and the Louisville Human Relations Commission."

The Council expressly acknowledges the role of the Urban League, an organization long devoted to improving the lot of Negroes. "This agency," the report notes, "has long extended neighborhood services into this as well as other parts of the city and has established historical as well as practical priorities in Target Area A,..."

Among the objectives contemplated for Futures Unlimited are:

- further organization and development of block clubs;
- door-to-door surveys to gain information and enlist citizen support of block clubs and of the project as a whole;
- a thorough program of code enforcement to be carried out by inspectors from the fire, health, sanitation, and city housing departments.

- "housing clinics," to which tenants, landlords, and developers can turn for advice on improving homes;
- recruitment of a corps of retired persons to serve as consultants on construction and finance problems;
- a continuous project of neighborhood beautification;
- communication and cooperation in the solution of neighborhood problems of all kinds;
- raising the educational and cultural level of the poor through closer cooperation between the schools and the social, recreational, and health agencies.

Jobs and preparation for jobs are prominent in the activities contemplated for Futures Unlimited, including personal counselling, job development and placement, and special technical classroom or on-the-job training -- with the openings in Louisville especially in view. This program is to be financed by the U. S. Office of Manpower and Development Training.

The organization plan and proposed first-year budget of Futures Unlimited contemplate the employment of a director (at $9,000), four neighborhood organizers

(at $5,000 each), clerical help whose aggregate compensation would total $19,800, and part-time workers in research, casework, and youth services. Counting office-rent and other expenses, the total budget is $69,800, the money to come from a variety of sources: the Urban Renewal Agency, city and county governments, and local and foundation contributions.

This is a suggestive, if unexciting, note on which to end this story of Louisville. For perhaps the most revealing fact about the city's race relations now is that they are passing into the hands of boards, commissions, official and semi-official committees, into, that is, the normal, institutionalized processes of municipal life.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE IN THE SOUTH*

THE FACT OF NEED

More of the poor of the United States live in the South than in any other region - almost half, according to 1960 U. S. census data.

The proportion of families trapped by poverty is larger in the South than in other regions. Almost one of every four is poor, according to U. S. census data.

Within the South, the proportion of Negro households in poverty is more than twice that of white households. A total of 17.9% of 12 million white families is poor, as opposed to 58.3% of 2.3 million Negro families, according to the Social Security Administration.

Ninety-seven of the 100 poorest counties in the United States are in the South.

These facts are the unanimous conclusions of analysts of American poverty who use differing economic categories and differing statistical sources. Whether the poverty line is defined as $3,000 or $4,000 per year or as a dependent variable of family size, age, and farm residence, the conclusions are the same. The South has more poverty overall, a higher rate of its occurrence, and the highest rate among its black people. (See also Tables 8 and 9.)

THE PLACE OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

Public assistance in the form of cash payments and aid has been a principal way to alleviate that poverty which consists primarily of monetary deprivation. It has been criticized as too limited, and as destructive of the family when administered in such a way that payments to aid children of impoverished families cannot be made when an employable male is in the house. Men out of work are forced to leave home so that the family will qualify for aid, according to the critics. It is not possible in the present study to resolve such controversy. The goal is to provide more information about the distribution of funds in the South under existing programs. The purpose is to describe what is being done in order to enlighten discussion of what ought to be done.

Three important clarifications should be made at this point. First, although public assistance is commonly called "welfare," it should not be confused with the total spectrum of social welfare programs. The funds for public assistance discussed here are separate from funds spent under programs such as the Old Age Survivors and Disability Insurance of Social Security, unemployment compensation, job-retraining, and the war on poverty. Public assistance consists primarily of cash aid to the indigent aged who are largely uncovered by Social Security insurance, to families with dependent children which have little or no income, to the blind and the permanently and totally disabled, and to acute cases of need discovered by welfare workers (called general assistance in attached tables). These general case assistance programs receive no federal funds and thus vary widely depending on the available resources and the commitments of the states.

Public assistance has also included cash aid to the aged for drug and hospital costs. The statistics in this study cover only the program for such aid that existed before adoption of the broader Medicare program.

Public assistance is what some disparagingly refer to as "the dole." Its beneficiaries are overwhelmingly the aged, dependent children, and the physically handicapped. The beneficiaries, contrary to popular myth, are not adult males who prefer to "loaf."

Typical of confusion was a headline in a large southern newspaper which said "22 Million on Dole." If the reader went beyond the headline, he discovered the "dole" referred to was largely from social security insurance funds for which the recipients had been directly taxed on every paycheck they received. Only 8 million of the 22 million were receiving a "dole," and most of them were either over 65 or under 18, or blind, or otherwise disabled, or sick. Public assistance is what goes to this distressed 8 million people. Since there are 1.5 million impoverished aged and at least 15 million impoverished children in this country, it hardly appears that public assistance with its 8 million recipients is going to more people than the degree of need requires. Indeed, it goes to far fewer than the number in need.

Moreover, from these facts it should be clear that public assistance reaches primarily those who are outside the labor force and thus cannot be aided by minimum wage laws and unemployment compensation. At the present time public assistance, however limited, is the only way being used to meet the problem of "monetary deprivation," a rather inane technical term which seeks to make a distinction between those poor whose only problem in satisfactorily adjusting to modern life is lack of money and those who need help beyond the simple getting of money.

The second clarification required is related to this issue of monetary deprivation. While not all poverty is covered by the concept, much of it is. The Wall Street Journal in September, 1966, reported that "the Johnson Administration is becoming increasingly intrigued with a far-reaching new goal: Ending poverty via a Government guarantee of a minimum income for every American family." But, the article goes on to point out, the Viet Nam war and existent domestic spending along with fear of Congressional and public resistance preclude the possibility of a direct approach to the goal, such schemes as the guaranteed annual income or negative income tax (no tax for those below a specified level and payments to bring them up to that level). Instead, there would be a gradual approach, an effort to "patch up and fatten up" existing programs, including Social Security, public-assistance coverage and payments, rent and other supplements, and public employment. If the public assistance programs are as poorly conceived and administered as their critics charge, then the new effort may mean merely the waste of more money. A study of how present funds are distributed among the states and how the states allocate proportions to such needs as the indigent aged and dependent children should--regardless of the merits of the present programs--indicate the degree of patching and fattening that would need to be done.

The third clarification required here concerns the possible charge that to stress cash payments ignores the "syndrome of poverty" approach. Poverty is more than a lack of money. It is a complex of social and personal deficiencies, rooted in the absence of opportunities for human development. This fact is more widely appreciated than ever before. Yet there is a danger of ignoring the economic component. While it is clearly true that for many of the poor cash payments alone will not mean getting out of the syndrome of poverty, it is equally true that better schools, health service, consumer education, housing and so forth will not alleviate an inability to get enough money to live on in the short run.

While cash payments alone will not suffice to end poverty for many of the poor, they will be sufficient to end poverty among those for whom deprivation is primarily or solely monetary. S. M. Miller argues persuasively that the majority of the poor are "stable," i.e. free from family or social pathologies and employed at steady but very low pay, low skill jobs. Many of these stable poor in the South and in the nation need nothing more than direct cash aid for their children or their own old age - plus job retraining for themselves and good education for their children. The boost from this support should be enough to break the monetary deprivation cycle permanently for about half the American poor, according to Miller. For them, the end of monetary deprivation would also mean the end of the poverty syndrome. For others, the broader attack on all social and cultural deficiencies would have to continue.

The cost of a start on cash subsidies would vary with how much was attempted. The Wall Street Journal report cited previously said that government officials thought it would cost from 6 billion to 7 billion dollars per year "to move the more than 30 million 'poor' people just halfway from their present incomes to the minimum desired levels - $3,000 for a family of four." Leon Keyserling's report for the Conference on Economic Progress, Poverty or Progress, estimates that 12.7 billion dollars a year would mean $1,427 more a year for each of the 8.9 million families with incomes below $3,000 in 1963.

Whatever method is ultimately used, there is considerable movement toward greater use of direct cash subsidy to end the poverty of monetary deprivation. Thus, it becomes extremely important to understand how cash subsidy is now used.

WHAT IS SPENT IN THE SOUTH FOR PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

What follows is primarily an examination of the status quo in public assistance. It tries to discover precisely what the South is doing in the face of the degree of poverty noted earlier. It also examines the proportion of federal resources received by the South.

Of all expenditures for public assistance payments in the United States in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1965, 21.8% occurred in the South.(Table 1.) This reflects the South's having 25.9% of the United States' population in 1960. But it does not reflect that almost half of the nation's poverty is in the South and that the incidence of poverty within the region is higher than in other regions, as noted earlier. It should be noted that states administer the allotment of federal funds. The size of the federal grant varies with the ability or desire to match from state resources or to operate state programs - hence the disparity among the states.

Among individual states, Texas and Louisiana spend significantly more than all the others. The size of the Texas expenditure can be attributed to the large population of the state. It is less impressive when considered on a per inhabitant basis (Table 3) or a rate per 1,000 basis. (Table 4.)

The large Louisiana expenditure is even more striking when either the size of the state, the number of recipients, the rate per 1,000 population, the average payment per recipient or all of these is considered.(Tables 2-4.) Prima facie, this state's program cannot be judged to be adequate simply because it was large relative to national as well as southern standards. That conclusion would require more investigation. The adequacy of the program becomes questionable when the specific programs to which the state allots its resources are considered. (Table 2.) Nevertheless, the case of Louisiana is atypical of the South in the public assistance field. The roots can be traced to the atypical southern politics of the regime of Huey Long in which desirable social welfare programs served the political welfare of Mr. Long to the chagrin of both some liberals, as well as the conservative business elite. The availability of petroleum resources as a means to finance such programs must also be noted.

At the other end of the scale stand Virginia and South Carolina. (Tables 2-4.) They were low by all the standards by which Louisiana was high. Total expenditures, degree of coverage, payment per recipient, and number covered were generally near or at the bottom of the region and the nation. Two notable exceptions occurred in Virginia and thereby differentiated it from South Carolina. First, Virginia spent more than twice as much overall for aid to dependent children than did South Carolina. It paid more per recipient to more families although its rate of coverage per 1000 was almost the same. (Table 4.) Second, while Virginia assisted those aged covered with higher payments, the degree of coverage per 1000 over age 65 was one-fourth that of South Carolina. (Table 4.)

The other states fall in irregular patterns between the extremes of Louisiana and South Carolina. Alabama and Mississippi attract special comment because of their positions in total spending and their ways of distributing funds. Mississippi's per inhabitant effort was relatively high, although total spending ranked near the bottom --just ahead of Virginia and South Carolina.(Tables 2 and 3.) Mississippi is unique, however, in that its amount of coverage per 1,000 children under 18 was highest in the South. Its coverage per 1,000 over 65 ranked third, just below Louisiana and Alabama. At the same time, the size of the average payments to the aged and to dependent children was the lowest in the region. Mississippi spread its resources to give a little to many. Alabama acted similarly in aiding dependent children, but aided the aged with high payments and a degree of coverage per 1,000 over 65 second only to Louisiana. The scope of assistance to the aged in Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi suggests the political utility of aid to the voting aged.

HOW THE SOUTH ALLOCATES PUBLIC ASSISTANCE RESOURCES

The contrast between aid to the aged and aid to dependent children is not limited to Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi. It is a regional pattern which is more pronounced in these states.(Table 1.)

The percentage distribution by program reveals that both in the South and in the nation these two programs account for the great bulk of public assistance expenditures. (Table 1.) With this, the similarity ends. Whereas in the nation as a whole assistance to the aged used 38.6% of all the funds and aid to dependent children used 32.6%, in the South the respective percentages were 65.1 and 18.2. The only southern states which approximated the national proportional distribution of 38.6% and 32.6% were North Carolina and Virginia (Table 2), but their rate of coverage per 1,000 population under age 18 was very limited. (Table 4.) The proportion given to the aged was above the regional average in Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, and Arkansas. The proportion given to dependent children was below the regional average in Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Arkansas, Mississippi, and South Carolina. (Table 2.)

The relative proportions allotted to the aged and to dependent children are a point of controversy. Most critics attack the national proportions as severely discriminatory against the needs of children and barely sufficient for the aged poor. (Table 4.) If the national proportions can be called inequitable, those in the South can be called iniquitous. An analysis by Burton Weisbrod indicates the degree of need among children. In this country, there are 15 million poor under age 18 in contrast to 1.5 million poor over age 65, according to Mollie Orshansky of the Social Security Administration. In June, 1965, the number of recipients of public assistance to the aged was 2.1 million nationwide, and the number of children aided was only 3.3 million.* It can be concluded that public assistance does not begin to cover the vast 15 million children who are poor. The proportion of children and aged people for the South is comparable, and the imbalance in aid favoring the aged is greater.

Children covered received average monthly payments of only $33.83 in the nation as a whole. For the South, dependent children received no higher than $25.55 in Kentucky and as low as $9.13 in Mississippi. (Table 4.) A study by the Georgia Council on Human Relations in cooperation with the Columbia University School of Social Work suggests that racial discrimination makes the burden on Negro children even more onerous than it is on white children.

In short, the present system of aid to dependent children does not begin to deal with the scope of poverty in the nation or region. While most, if not all, the aged poor are being aided, they may not be receiving sufficiently large payments. Most of the 15 million children who are poor go largely unhelped by public assistance. A bare 3.3 million of them are aided as "dependent" -- And these "lucky" ones of course deserve more systematic and substantial aid if the developmental roots of poverty are to be severed.

The respective proportions of assistance to children and the aged are not the only ones deserving comment, although they are the largest programs. Equally symptomatic of problems in the region's public assistance policies are the low allocations for medical assistance to the aged and general assistance.(Table 1.) The South accounted for only 4.1% of the total national expenditures for medical aid to the aged under public assistance programs. It spent only 4.9% of the total national funds for general assistance, i.e., individual cases of special need determined by case-workers in many instances. Whereas in the nation as a whole, medical assistance to the aged received 9.9% of all public assistance funds, and general assistance received 7.2%, in the South medical aid accounted for only 1.8% of all public assistance funds spent in the region and general assistance accounted for only 1.6%.

The implications here are twofold. First, southern states have not fully availed themselves of available federal resources for medical aid probably because of non-discrimination conditions for full participation and because state funds are also required. Propaganda against "socialized medicine" should also be considered. Mississippi, Georgia, and Texas had no programs at all. Others were very limited. (Table 2.) Second, since there are no federal funds for general assistance to special cases, most southern states have made little effort to fulfill their own responsibility. Only Louisiana made a significant effort relative to its size. Florida did relatively well also. Texas spent less than Louisiana for a population three times as large. Louisiana and Texas have important revenue sources in their extensive petroleum deposits. The other states either do not have or have not allocated adequate or even minimal resources for general assistance.(Table 2.)

SOURCES OF FUNDS

The discussion of resources for general assistance raises the question of source of funds. In general, the South is much more dependent on federal funds than is the nation as a whole.(Table 5.) Further, local governments give proportions of aid in the South much smaller than in the nation except on general assistance. On this program, southern local governments compensate for deficiency of state government efforts. Also worthy of note is the extent to which federal funds subsidize the southern preference for aid to the aged over aid to dependent children. Consequently, in the nation, 45.9% of all federal public assistance funds go for old age assistance.(Table 6.) Also, payments in the South accounted for 43.3% of all federal old-age assistance funds, as opposed to the South's accounting for only 30% of all federal public assistance funds. Of all public assistance funds, federal, state and local combined, payments in the South accounted for only 21.8%.(Table 1.) Finally, when state funds alone are considered, southern states spend considerably less than both their population and their degree of poverty require.(Table 7.)

CONCLUSIONS

1. As a whole and in almost all the individual states, public assistance expenditures in the South have been below the national average in terms of total funds, amounts per inhabitant, average payment per recipient, and coverage per 1,000 population in the given category for special assistance. Louisiana is an exception to this regional pattern.

2. Expenditure of federal public assistance funds in the South has not been commensurate with the degree of need indicated by comparative statistics on poverty in the region and nation. It appears to be more commensurate with population.

3. The per recipient payments under aid to dependent children have been woefully inadequate in the region and the nation. The number of children aided is far below the number of children in poverty in the region and below even the inadequate rate in the nation.

4. Southern states have given a larger proportion of assistance to the aged than has the nation as a whole; they have given a smaller proportion to aid dependent children despite the fact that there are more children who are poor than aged poor. Payments to the aged are larger than payments to children in the region and nation.

5. Southern states avoided pre-medicare programs of aged-medical aid.

6. Southern states except Louisiana and Florida, compared with the nation, have made little effort to aid cases of special need under general assistance programs.

7. Southern states have depended much more on federal funds for public assistance programs than the nation as a whole. At the same time, they have not applied for all the federal funds that were available to be spent for needs among their poor.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION # IN THE # SOUTHERN FEDERAL COURTS

The exclusion of Negroes from the administration of justice in the state courts of the South has long been the subject of serious criticism and concern. But little attention has been given to the extent of exclusion of Negroes from the federal courts of the South.

One obvious reason is that, in the conflict between state and federal law on basic Constitutional questions of the past two decades, the state courts have with frequency appeared as the antagonist of the Negro Southerner, and the federal courts frequently as his protector.

This protection has come, however, largely through the overriding decisions of federal appellate courts. As federal jurisdiction is extended, the role of the federal courts becomes ever more vital to the national effort to achieve full justice. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 enlarges the responsibility of the federal courts, including district courts, many of which in the past have been highly protective of segregation. The voting bill now before Congress seeks to by-pass these courts. New federal legislation to protect citizens against the Klan and other dispensers of death and ruin will, however, almost certainly increase the reliance on the district courts of the South for the protection of individual life and liberty.

Pressures to move civil rights issues out of the streets and into the courts continue. The question has to be asked (and it has always had its pertinency in criminal cases) -- what kinds of courts will handle them?

The federal court system in the South, guided by the Supreme Court and the Courts of Appeals, has slowly demonstrated the ability of a frankly white-dominated institution to deal justly with the broad, crucial questions of race. But now, not just the logic and principles of these very decisions but all the practical understanding of human dealings that is implied in the term "jury of his peers," require a closer look at the racial composition of the courts themselves, as administrators of justice to the individual as well as guardians of principle.

This report deals with employment practices and jury composition of the southern federal courts. It is based on such documentation as there is available plus interviews with lawyers practicing in the federal courts of each state.

States covered by the survey are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas in the Fifth Circuit; North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia in the Fourth; Tennessee in the Sixth, and Arkansas in the Eighth Circuit. Each state contains from two to four U. S. District Courts. Data on the Courts of Appeals refer only to their offices and operations within these eleven states.

Clerical records of the federal government do not designate race of court employees, and there are no compilations of statistics on racial composition of juries. No systematic examination of each court in each state was attempted. Respondents for the most part relied on memory and general knowledge. Results of such a survey are not definitive or finally authoritative; there is room for minor errors and oversights. But such a survey does reveal general patterns, and it is with these that we are concerned. If more detailed and precise research is stimulated, that is good; but the immediate purpose is a new awareness of the need to improve the situation.

I. EMPLOYMENT

The broad patterns regarding the role of Negroes in the federal courts under study in this survey can be summed up in the following statistical table:

RACIAL DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICERS AND PERSONNEL IN SOUTHERN FEDERAL COURTS

| | TOTAL | WHITE | NEGRO |
|---|---|---|---|
| Circuit Court Judges | 12* | 12 | 0 |
| District Court Judges | 65 | 65 | 0 |

| Jury Commissioners | 109 | 109 | 0 |
| U. S. Marshals | 29 | 29 | 0 |
| Deputy U. S. Marshals | 165 | 156 | 9 |
| Secretarial and Clerical | 364 | ** | ** |

*This is the number of judges of southern residence now serving on the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits. The numbers respectively are three, seven, one, and one.

Exact number of Negroes not ascertainable. The number, from observation, is quite small.

The above table may possibly overlook some Negroes in some positions. But it cannot be far from the exact numerical situation.

The circuit court and district court judges are appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. So are the United States attorneys and marshals. The clerks of the respective courts are appointed by the judges. The judges also appoint U. S. commissioners, jury commissioners, and the referees in bankruptcy. The clerks select their own deputies and clerical assistants, subject to approval of the judges. Assistant U. S. attorneys are appointed by the Attorney General of the United States. The Attorney General authorizes marshals to appoint deputy marshals.

Exclusion of Negroes from the top positions in the system obviously has the practical effect of virtually eliminating them from lesser positions. The influence on appointments and hiring by southern office-holders through political party patronage channels can't be overlooked.

Of the nine Negro deputy marshals there are two in Alabama, one in Mississippi, two in North Carolina, one in South Carolina, two in Tennessee, one in Virginia. Of the five assistant United States attorneys, one is in North Carolina, one in Tennessee, two in Texas, one in Virginia. This is at best tokenism.

In no state are Negroes serving in the positions of importance and highest responsibility except in token numbers as deputy marshals and assistant U. S. attorneys, and in four states -- Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, and Louisiana -- in none of these positions at all.

In lesser positions, a Negro clerical worker was noted in Alabama, a bailiff in both Florida and Georgia, court criers in Virginia and South Carolina, and two secretaries in Texas. Again, some may have been overlooked, but not enough to change the general picture.

In nearly every state, employment of Negroes in custodial jobs was noted. Use of Negro employees designated as "criers" or "messengers" as valets, chauffeurs, and the like was reported. In Georgia, such an employee's duties were described as helping the judge with his robes, bringing his books, and driving for him.

A respondent in Alabama said: "If it were not for the lone Negro deputy marshal, the District Court in Birmingham would look like the County Courthouse." A respondent in Virginia, when asked if he were describing Negro employment in addition to a deputy marshall and two criers as "negligible," replied: "nonexistent." Instances were cited in Tennessee, Texas, and Georgia of Negroes turning down appointments or jobs. Strenuous opposition was encountered to appointment of the three Negroes in responsible jobs in North Carolina. This came from various sources, including political ones.

II. JURY SERVICE

Negroes are called and do serve on petit and grand juries in the southern federal courts. Estimating and evaluating the degree to which they do is of course not an exact science. One respondent's "tokenism" might be another's "substantial numbers" or another's "fair amount."

But for the very most part, lawyers interviewed in each of the eleven states were not satisfied that Negroes are serving on juries to the extent that they should be.

In Alabama, a typical jury panel was described as five or six Negroes among 110; Negroes occasionally serve on grand juries. An Arkansas respondent said he and others estimated that out of double panels of 40 to 50 persons, three or four might be Negroes, and out of a single panel of 24, one or two might be Negroes. In most cases in Arkansas, lawyers consider Negroes as "ciphers" who will go along with the majority, but they are said to dismiss Negroes when opposing counsel has been active in civil rights. There is a general understanding in Arkansas, a respondent said, of the need to avoid the appearance of systematic exclusion. In Florida, one sees "as many Negroes as women" on jury panels; their service was termed "more than token," but less than reflective of Negro population. Negroes were said to be called "fairly" for jury duty in Louisiana, but more than average numbers are eliminated by challenge or excuse from serving on the jury. The same was said of South Carolina. Mississippi's situation was described as "token." So was Tennessee's, Georgia's, and North Carolina's, with recognition in the latter of some improving efforts. In Texas, the estimate ranged from "token" to "substantial numbers," with more of a conflict of opinion among respondents over whether enough Negroes serve than in other states. A Virginia respondent said that from five to seven Negroes might be on a panel of 30, from two to five on a grand jury. A respondent said the number serving on federal juries throughout the state is "not sufficient."

The respondents described two problems involved in getting satisfactory numbers of Negroes on federal juries. One is whether or not enough Negroes are called for jury service in the first place. The other is whether among those called, even if it is a "fair" number, enough Negroes get through the various processes of attrition to do what really counts -- actually serve on a jury.

One often cited reason for a smaller number of Negroes called for jury duty is the lack of knowledge of the Negro community on the part of the mostly white court personnel. (All southern jury commissioners are white.) Prospective jurors are generally selected by a procedure described by the Judicial Conference of the United States in The Jury System in the Federal Courts, September, 1960. It involves getting persons of substance to recommend those who might be selected. Often, only white persons make these recommendations. Even the Negroes who make them might not be persons of knowledgeable acquaintanceship in the Negro community. They are often the Negroes who happen to come into contact with white persons.

A Tennessee respondent said officials go to persons such as the presidents of chambers of commerce for names for jury lists. Use of state jury lists was reported in parts of Georgia and Virginia. Use of voter registration lists -- which are notoriously low in the number of Negroes -- was reported in Mississippi.

Some respondents singled out individual district courts where genuinely conscientious efforts seem to be made, with varying degrees of success, to get representative numbers of Negroes on the jury lists. These included the Middle District of Florida, the Atlanta Division of the Northern District of Georgia, the Middle District of North Carolina.

The lawyers interviewed were inclined to attribute the high amount of attrition among prospective Negro jurors mostly to racial circumstances, partly to other causes.

Peremptory challenges by opposing attorneys account for some of the attrition, particularly where the case involves Negroes. Negroes, in the view of defense attorneys, value Negro life and welfare, it seems, more highly than whites. Another reason often cited is economic, and it applies to large numbers of whites as well. Hourly wage earners (unless they have a union contract or other agreement guaranteeing compensatory pay) and persons of low income generally are unable to give up the working time (and pay) that jury service entails. So they get excused if they can. Negroes in disproportionately large numbers, compared with whites, are hourly wage earners and low-income workers in the South. A respondent in Mississippi commented that most Negro hourly workers there could probably earn more serving on a federal jury.

* * * * * *

The broad findings of the study show that a Negro involved in federal court action in the South could go from the beginning of the case to the end without seeing any black faces unless they are in the court audience, or he happens to notice the man sweeping the floor.

The problem of the personnel of the courts seems easily and obviously remediable. More Negro appointments and hiring are needed. There are reports of political and other opposition when conscientious efforts are made to accomplish this. There are also reports of instances where Negroes turned down appointments or jobs. Negro attorneys are in short supply in the South, but the survey does not indicate by any means that their number or that of other qualified persons has been fully called upon.

The courts seem out of line with the fair employment hiring practices of federal agencies, not to mention the spirit and philosophy of the civil rights statute.

But the employment practices of the court system is not the only, or even the largest, issue. The responsibility for the appointment of federal judges and the U. S. attorneys is the President's. At its 1964 Annual Meeting (November 20-21) the Southern Regional Council adopted and conveyed to the President a resolution which said in part:

> It is our strong conviction that only men of the highest professional competence and the fullest devotion to the declared principles of the Constitution should be charged with the judicial responsibility of enforcing federal laws in the South. It is our further conviction that no appointment contrary to these qualifications, however strongly urged by state or Congressional spokesmen, can satisfy the new politics of the South. In a situation where plain talk is desirable, we would report as plainly as we can that the progressive leadership of the South, both Negro and white, would find the appointment or promotion of any judge of well-authenticated segregationist views to be a severe blow to regional, national, and democratic interests.

The problem of jury service is more complex. If the impressions of respondents in this survey are correct, then a great many more Negroes need to be called and to serve on southern federal juries. The widespread reports of nonuse of low income and hourly income workers on southern juries raise questions beyond racial considerations. One may not only ask if it is possible under present circumstances to get a federal jury of peers for people who are not white, but also for persons who, regardless of race, are not middle-class.

Proposals have been made to select jury lists much as public opinion poll samples are chosen -- at random in such numbers from lists of all qualified persons so as to get a true cross-section of the community in terms of the various socio-economic factors, including race and income level. Some such fresh approach seems needed.

There is an urgency to this. The goal of nondiscriminatory selection of juries is to assure that only the facts and evidence of the case will affect outcome of a trial. It would be just as much a tragedy if public clamor and legal maneuvering over exclusion of Negroes from juries were to become a factor in the outcome of a trial as when this results from discriminatory bias in the composition of a jury.

Reform of the basic institutions of American society is compelled by the logic of the civil rights movement. What began as an effort to correct the most glaring inequities of racial discrimination requires that the general structure of inequity be overhauled, looking toward the ideal of liberty and justice for all.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION 1966: THE SLOW UNDOING

I. INTRODUCTION: THE GENUINE ISSUE

The school year 1966-67 arrived amid controversy over the implementation of school desegregation guidelines and amid still successful avoidance of an end in the South to racially separated schools as ordered by the Supreme Court in 1954. Some southern public officials had launched an at least partially successful campaign to persuade the nation that the United States Office of Education (U.S.O.E.) had "gone beyond the law" in enforcing Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Public and even congressional debate had been focused both on a charge that excessive administrative zeal had been put into enforcement of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and on a question of the intent of Congress when it passed the act.

One might question the appropriateness of these concerns in the context of the wording of Section 601 of Title VI:

> No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to, discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal financal assistance.

Given this language of Title VI and the weight of the nation's highest judicial opinion on equal protection under the Constitution, it can be asked whether in fact the U.S.O.E. had gone far enough in carrying out the mandate given in Section 602 of Title VI "to effectuate the provisions of Section 601 [cited above] . . . by issuing rules, regulations, or orders of general applicability . . . ."

Indeed, it seems clear that by accepting gradualism in its guidelines the U.S.O.E. took a conservative approach to carrying out its mandate from Congress. Thus, complaints about the degree of zeal put into enforcement of an essentially conservative policy may be seen in proper perspective.

No amount of qualification of intent by Congress could stand the test of constitutionality if its effect was to deny equal protection of the law by allowing segregated dual school systems to continue under an assumed name -- freedom of choice schools -- subsidized by federal funds. Only repeal of the Fourteenth Amendment could achieve what some southern officials have attempted through amendments to annual appropriations and through complaints about the "unreasonableness" of federal examiners.

The study which follows attempts to provide more facts. The premise on which it does so is that the body politic needs to be confronted with a clearer choice about itself on the desegregation issue. Will it allow the prima facie intent of Title VI and the Supreme Court decision of 1954 to be circumvented? Will it, despite John Kennedy's words, both witness and permit "the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed"?

II. THE 1966 GUIDELINES: THE END OF INNOCENCE

1965 RECONSIDERED

In 1965, the United States Office of Education seemed to assume good faith on the part of southern school officials in complying with desegregation guidelines. In view of the long history of attempted evasion of court orders since 1954 on the part of many of these same officials and on the part of governors and other public office holders, this assumption was questioned by many interested in obedience of the law. A special report of the Southern Regional Council stated at that time:

> The most rigid checks are needed -- and have been from the beginning -- to be sure at every step of the administrative process that plans for "voluntary" action comply with all requirements of the law, and that the plans are carried out so as to meet all requirements of the law. Any other course in the South in this matter risks criticism as naive and encourages the kind of winking at the law that has been for too long a serious fault of southern society.

The performance on school desegregation in the South during 1965-66 was not reassuring. This was the first year that the Office of Education had the duty of enforcing Title VI in the schools. A decade of litigation over the 1954 school decision of the Supreme Court had by September, 1966, resulted in a pitifully small amount of desegregation. Approximately two percent of the 2,896,100 Negro children in the eleven southern states were in desegregated schools in 1964-65. The number was increased to about six percent during 1965-66, a disappointing result considering the fanfare for Title VI, and what might have been achieved under it.

Late in January, 1966, Harold Howe, II, the new U. S. Commissioner of Education, requested suggestions for changing the 1965 guidelines for 1966. Wall Street Journal columnist Jonathan Spivak commiserated with the federal agency's "almost impossible assignment: Strengthening the standards sufficiently to satisfy its civil rights critics and yet not so much as to provoke explosive southern resistance, sacrificing the integration gains already achieved. /6.01% of Negro pupils in school with whites in the South in 1965./ 'In this business, any decision is wrong; that's why no one wants to make them, frets one school desegregation specialist.'"

Shortly after Mr. Howe's request, representatives of eight civil rights and human relations organizations attacked the U.S.O.E.'s school desegregation program for 1965 as "too weakly drawn and too timidly enforced." They planned meetings in five southern states to try to persuade the federal government to carry out a "massive school desegregation program."

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights advocated a

"federal law to protect Negro students who attend white schools from intimidation and harassment." It also declared that freedom of choice plans "should not be permitted as a device for perpetuation of dual school systems." The Commission said its own studies showed that states which made the most use of freedom of choice plans had the lowest percentage of Negroes going to school with whites. The plans placed all initiative on Negroes, and often with no protection from resultant physical and economic intimidation. The Commission recommended that the Office of Education adopt policies and procedures which "will assure adequate evaluation and monitoring of desegregation plans for the 5,000 school districts in the southern and border states. This would require on-the-spot inspection of some school districts and the Office of Education should seek more funds if needed for personnel to do such investigation." The Commission also repeated a recommendation of civil rights organizations that school districts operating under court order be required to file plans complying with federal guidelines.

Many suggestions centered on intimidation, a quite serious problem in school desegregation as in most other areas of civil rights law enforcement. (The proposed 1966 civil rights legislation would have made a major step toward remedying the situation with a provision making it a federal offense to interfere with attempts of persons seeking to exercise their civil rights, and another reforming jury selection procedures. Defeat of the bill in what seemed a reaction against civil rights progress in 1966 was a major setback to the South.)

Meanwhile, the U.S.O.E. in early 1966 was drafting new school desegregation guidelines. There was candid admission at the Office of Education that something stronger than new guidelines would be needed to break segregation patterns in school systems outside the South. By this time, many of those seeking implementation of the law were convinced the same was true for the South.

THE NEW GUIDELINES: ACCEPTANCE AND REJECTION

On March 7, the new guidelines were issued. They included many revisions recommended by the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. Where desegregation of four grades had been required the year before, more grades were required this time, and all grades by 1967 would be expected to desegregate. The beginning of faculty desegregation where it had not occurred was also required. All of this was consistent with court orders in school cases saying that faculty desegregation was a necessary element of school desegregation, that free-choice plans must be fair, and that school boards have an obligation to work affirmatively to achieve desegregation.

Probably the most serious criticism of the previous year's guidelines had been that many of the freedom of choice plans had not been fair. They put all of the burden for compliance on Negroes, and allowed school officials, local police, and white society in general to shirk responsibility. The new guidelines tried to shift the responsibility more nearly to where it belonged -- on the local officials, and particularly those in charge of schools. The new guidelines stated:

> Each school system is responsible for the effective implementation of its desegregation plan. Within their authority, school officials are responsible for the protection of persons exercising rights under, or otherwise affected by, the plan. They must take appropriate action with regard to any student or staff member who interferes with the successful operation of the plan, whether or not on school grounds. If officials of the school system are not able to provide sufficient protection, they must seek whatever assistance is necessary from other appropriate officials.

Criteria were established in the guidelines for determining whether a given free-choice (or other type) desegregation plan was actually working. A plausible criterion was whether or not the plan resulted in "substantial achievement" of desegregation. Mr. Howe indicated the following measures of "substantial achievement" would be used by his office:

(1) If a system had transferred eight to nine percent of its Negro pupils from a segregated school in 1965, at least twice that number would "normally be expected" to be transferred in September of 1966.

(2) In the cases where four to five percent had transferred, the percentage would be expected to triple next term.

(3) Where the transfer percentage was lower than four percent, "then the rate of increase in total transfers for the 1966-67 school year would normally be expected to be proportionately greater than under (2) above," according to the regulations. This would seem to mean it would have to quadruple or reach an approximate minimum of ten percent.*

States whose records, according to Southern Education Reporting Service figures, had been lower than four percent in 1965-66 were: Alabama, 0.43%; Georgia, 2.66%; Louisiana, 0.69%; Mississippi, 0.59%, and South Carolina, 1.46%.

Two weeks after the guidelines were issued, the Southern Education Reporting Service noted that there had been "little immediate reaction from most southern states, except an indication of reluctant acceptance." The Nashville-based private organization indicated that strongest opposition had come from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi.

*Excessively expressed exasperation was a mark of much of the criticism by southern schoolmen of the guidelines. How much of it was generated needlessly by such expression as this in ten closely printed pages of guidelines?

Georgia Governor Carl Sanders termed the guidelines "another illustration of government by bureau," and Congressman Phil Landrum (D-Ga.), said the Office of Education was "pushing too hard, too fast." Alabama Governor George Wallace declared, "We must obey the laws, just and unjust, but we should not have to obey the edicts of bureaucratic officials which go beyond the law."

In Mississippi, a school district which had led the state in voluntary compliance the first year was reported unwilling to comply with the new set of guidelines.

"Shock" and "surprise," expressed plaintively in other statements, were predictable as pro forma responses in some southern political situations. They were not taken as indicative of the scope and depth of recalcitrance which later was to develop.

Meanwhile, Attorney General Nicholas DeB. Katzenbach, speaking at the University of South Carolina, called the guidelines "moderate, perhaps even tardy benchmarks . . . They contain no sudden surprises nor do they in themselves break new ground."

COMPLIANCE DEADLINE NUMBER 1

Under the complicated regulations of enforcement, school districts considered still to be operating dual systems were required to file plans for desegregation compliance (Form 441-B). Of the approximately 5,000 districts in the 17 southern and border states, some 1,900 (most of them in the 11 southern states) were required to file the form. On April 4, Mr. Howe announced that those which had not filed them by an April 15 deadline would be notified that they faced loss of federal aid. It was also made clear that these forms would be subject to future tests of performance and were not sufficient evidence of actual compliance. Compliance forms trickled in slowly. Jack Nix, Georgia's state school superintendent, reported that only 20 of the state's 196 systems had signed Form 441-B. Alabama superintendents voted 76 to 4 to adopt a resolution urging their congressional delegation to seek a modification of the guidelines, adding, "We cannot follow directives." (At a statewide meeting held by U.S.O.E. staff in Birmingham reported by the Los Angeles Times, one school official asked, "Where'd you leave your carpetbags, you dirty Commies?" Another asked, "What if I can't find a Negro teacher qualified to teach in a white school?" The Office of Education representative, Wallace McBain, a Marquette University professor, responded, "If she isn't qualified, what is she doing in your system? . . . The 'separate but equal' ruling was made in 1894 . . . You aren't even willing to go that far.")

Administrative procedures for the drastic act of cutting off funds under Title VI were made deliberately slow. No one wants to cut off vitally needed education funds; the approach appears designed to make maximum use of the threat of loss of funds, with the act of cutting them off held in abeyance as long as possible, an ultimate weapon. Then there are two significantly different procedures here, too, often lumped together as "fund cut-offs" in reportage. Funds for new programs may be deferred -- that is, held up -- until a school system corrects its non-compliance. This approach has been frequently used in compelling the systems to sign compliance forms. And funds may be terminated -- a more drastic act which means no federal support as long as a system is not in compliance.

By mid-April of 1966, no funds had been terminated under the first guidelines covering the 1965-66 school year. Examiners had held hearings on 65 school systems, with recommendations that aid be terminated for 41. By the fall of 1966, indications were 39 systems actually had the funds terminated.

This slow-grinding process, as described in such newspapers as the Los Angeles Times, should have helped the nation to put into perspective the cries of alarm growing louder in the South over the 1966-67 guidelines.

For all their outcries, southern officials must have been aware of this basic reasonableness of Title VI enforcement procedures, and of the U.S.O.E.'s difficulties with the role of enforcement agency. The Los Angeles Times quoted a Georgia school board attorney as saying, "We are going to tell them we intend to comply. Then we are going to tell them, 'Make us.'"

In contrast to the immediate reaction of routine expression of dismay over the new guidelines, a more specific and more vehement response set in as the deadline approached. There were widespread charges, quoted considerably in the southern press, that the guidelines imposed a formula for racial balance and demanded instant desegregation of teaching staffs. On April 11, Secretary Gardner sent letters to governors, congressmen, and state school officials denying these two specific accusations. It should be noted at this point that the latter action, full desegregation of faculties, might well have been demanded under the law at the outset. The fact is that full desegregation of faculties was not required even in the second year of enforcement. Only a beginning was required.

Mr. Gardner answered the "racial balance" argument by pointing out that percentages were an "administrative guide" for measuring progress under free-choice plans. His point was that of the civil rights critics of the previous year's plan: There had to be standards.

H.E.W. officials insisted that their denials of these charges were not a softening of the guidelines. They were, however, generally viewed as an attempt to head off a full-scale revolt by southern school districts. And whether rightly or wrongly, an impression was gained that not only were the percentage requirements highly flexible but that they would bend in proportion to amounts of resistance and political pressure mustered against them.

Resistance continued. Boycotts were urged in some school districts to protest the guidelines. By the 19th of April, only one Louisiana school system had filed a compliance form; only four in Alabama had done so.

The deadline had been April 15. By the end of April, only 1,193 of the 1,900 school systems required to file the compliance forms had done so. The United States Office of Education extended its deadline to May 6.

COMPLIANCE DEADLINE NUMBER 2

On May 5, the Office of Education ordered that payment of federal funds be deferred for new school projects in districts which had not filed compliance forms by May 6. As of May 7, the number of these was 255. In the language of the regulations, it will be remembered, deferment of funds is less drastic than termination. And only new projects were involved. By far the most of federal aid to a school system would of course be in programs previously in effect.

Directors of eight southern state Councils on Human Relations (private biracial organizations) at about this time wrote to Commissioner Howe, urging the withholding of all funds from districts that "flagrantly disobey the guidelines." A few such actions in each state "would open the opportunity for real headway this year toward the final goal," they said.

By mid-May, 1,475 of the 1,893 school districts required to submit the compliance form were judged to have acceptable desegregation plans. Others were being studied.

More than 200 districts were still refusing to file. A few weeks later, 21 of these school districts were reported flatly refusing to follow the guidelines, and others had still not filed their forms.

Meanwhile, the House of Representatives in early May had, in Mr. Gardner's words, "dealt a real blow to H.E.W.'s plans for compliance." The House cut a budget request for compliance programs for 1966. The budget had proposed 348 staff members, and the House had cut this by 70.

Jack Greenberg, director-counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, had said back in March that the "guidelines' effectiveness in desegregating public schools will depend fundamentally on whether the Administration is willing to make a powerful political commitment on manpower and funds to achieve desegregation. We have had no encouragement in this area. Enforcing the guidelines, even with a great commitment of appropriations and manpower, will nevertheless be difficult because of their complexity, permissiveness in many areas, and wide scope of exceptions."

In late May, Commissioner Howe spoke with about two dozen southern congressmen who were of the opinion that the guidelines were illegal. Gubernatorial candidate James Martin, a Republican congressman from Alabama, came away from this meeting claiming that the commissioner of education had been "shaken," for whatever such opinion was worth.

A LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

Eighteen southern senators sent a letter, dated May 2 but released to the press May 13, to President Johnson. The letter, which was, according to news stories, written by Georgia's Senator Richard Russell and distributed for signatures by Mississippi's Senator John Stennis, was labeled a "Most Solemn Petition." It said in part:

> We come to you as Chief Executive of the nation to protest vigorously the abuse of power involved in the bureaucratic imposition of the guidelines and we earnestly beseech your personal intervention to right this wrong and have this order revoked . . . In our efforts to protect our schools and the children who will direct the destinies of our states tomorrow, we earnestly appeal to you to intervene and prevent illegal, unfair, and unrealistic action by the Office of Education.

The letter was signed by Alabama's Lister Hill and John Sparkman; Arkansas's J. William Fulbright and John L. McCellan; Florida's Spessard Holland and George A. Smathers; Georgia's Richard Russell and Herman Talmadge; Louisiana's Allen Ellender and Russell B. Long; Mississippi's John C. Stennis and James O. Eastland, North Carolina's B. Everett Jordan and Sam J. Ervin, Jr.; South Carolina's Donald Russell and J. Strom Thurmond; Virginia's Harry Flood Byrd, Jr., and A. Willis Robertson. The senators from Tennessee and Texas did not sign.

Newspapers subsequently reported that President Johnson had responded to Senator Russell, but the letter itself was not made public. President Johnson was reported to have replied that he considered the guidelines "fair." "Percentage requirements in the guidelines were for administrative procedure," he was quoted as saying. He pointed out that the regulations permitted continuation of "freedom of choice" plans and did not require racial balance or busing.

SUMMER MANEUVERS: RETRENCHMENT AND RETREAT

Over the summer, there were other rumblings from powerful southern political forces. At the annual meeting of the Southern Regional Education Board (a creature of a 15-state compact) in Miami Beach, Governor George C. Wallace of Alabama sought to line up unified opposition to the guidelines. Governors and educators in attendance rejected open defiance, but many agreed with Governor Wallace that the guidelines went too far.

In South Carolina, Attorney General Daniel R. McLeod met with H.E.W. officials to determine "how they justify the requirements of the guidelines." He was accompanied by Robert Alexander, federal coordinator for the governor's office. South Carolina Governor Robert McNair had said that the state attorney general's office would make its services available to any school district bringing court action against the guidelines in the event of loss of federal funds.

Further evidence that integration was far from realized accumulated. On July 1, the Office of Education had issued a preliminary report on the progress of school desegregation required by the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The Office estimated that as of the 1965-66 school year, almost 80% of all white public school pupils in the United States in the first and twelfth grades attended schools that were from 90-100% white, and at least 97% in the first grade and 99% in the twelfth grade went to schools that were more than 50% white. The report also stated that more than 65% of all Negro pupils in the first grade attended schools that were between 90 and 100% Negro. Furthermore, 87% of Negro pupils at grade one and 66% at grade twelve attended schools that were 50% or more Negro.

In the South, the report added, "most students attend schools that are 100 percent white or Negro." A complete 400 page report was to be issued later.

It was becoming apparent that concessions which weakened the guidelines were being won from the U.S.O.E. by local school officials. The pattern seemed to be complaints to Washington backed by pressure from southern congressmen.

The case of W. Stanley Kruger, compliance officer for South Carolina, Florida, and Georgia, attracted considerable attention.

Mr. Kruger became embroiled in exchanges in the press with superintendents of two Atlanta-area systems, Fulton County, which administers the schools outside the city limits of its county seat, Atlanta, and DeKalb County, a residential suburb. Both areas are generally conservative. In both instances, Mr. Kruger pressed these superintendents on what seemed to him weak points in their compliance with the guidelines. Both argued that they were trying to be cooperative and complained of the manner as well as the substance of Mr. Kruger's dealings with them. In both instances, the superintendents, DeKalb with help from Representative James Mackay, and Fulton with support from state school officials, complained to Washington and appeared to have been sustained. Certainly, there was no clear-cut backing of Mr. Kruger, and no effective action about the matters complained of.

The handling of the DeKalb case called forth a searing memorandum to Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Gardner from H.E.W.'s Atlanta regional director, William Page. Not intended for publication but somehow released to the press, the memorandum warned against the undermining of regional enforcement efforts by Washington officials. Said Mr. Page in a seeming reference to Superintendent Jim Cherry of DeKalb: "If any of the 2,000 school superintendents can negotiate his case with Commissioner Howe, why should 10,000 hospital administrators not have direct access to the surgeon-general?"

Some Georgia school officials met in Washington with Mr. Howe on August 4. They demanded that he transfer Mr. Kruger. Congressmen and other political figures echoed the demand. The educators called Mr. Kruger the "hatchet man" for the Office of Education, charging that he had been "disruptive." South Carolina officials were saying at the time that Mr. Kruger had been enforcing the 1966 guidelines to the extent that only five of South Carolina's 108 school districts had had their plans approved. Mr. Howe assured the delegation that he "would review the Kruger situation."

On September 9, the Atlanta Constitution reported that W. Stanley Kruger had been transferred to another job. Commissioner Howe announced the move in conjunction with a change to locating compliance personnel in regional offices rather than Washington. H.E.W. officials pointed out that all other compliance officers had previously been transferred. But whether intended so or not, the move was interpreted by Southerners for and against school desegregation as a yielding to local pressure against enforcement of the law.

THE COMING OF FALL

As fall arrived and schools opened, the Wall Street Journal of September 12 reported that some school districts, mostly in the Deep South, had decided to forego federal funds rather than desegregate. The largest increases in desegregation were coming in large cities which already had been under court orders to integrate. Some courts have accelerated the required pace of desegregation. For example, in New Orleans where some frenzied white women howled at the court-ordered desegregation of two schools in 1960, the number of Negro students attending schools with whites increased from 1,800 to 5,752. Faculty desegregation also began. Disturbances over desegregation in St. Bernard Parish near New Orleans in the fall, 1966, suggested that protest, like many well-to-do whites, had moved to the suburbs. In Atlanta, where desegregation began peacefully in 1961, the number of Negro students in interracial schools was expected to increase substantially over the 6,000 mark of the previous year but precise numbers could not be obtained. In both these cities and others, however, there were indications that officials included in totals of "desegregated" Negroes students from predominantly Negro schools which had only token white attendance.

In Alabama, the state legislature passed an anti-guidelines bill prohibiting compliance agreements. Most compliant (and this was no more than half) school officials seemed to have ignored this law, however. In Mississippi, shocking assaults by grown men armed with chains and clubs on Negro children entering desegregated schools occurred in Grenada. This probably ugliest spectacle of all school desegregation brutalities suggested a realistic perspective for those who had become complacent about southern "progress."

In Louisiana, Leander Perez, president of the official Plaquemines Parish Council, reacted to desegregation of public schools of Plaquemines Parish under federal court order by aiding the establishment of private schools. The Times-Picayune reported that public school buses were being used to transport white pupils to the private school at the Perez family plantation. In Bogalusa, limited violence broke out at the junior high school and a larger clash was narrowly averted.

THE COMPLIANCE SITUATION: FALL, 1966

U.S.O.E. statistics reported in the Wall Street Journal on September 12 indicated that as of mid-September, 2,669 of the 4,600 school districts in the 17 southern and border states were desegregated satisfactorily according to standards of U.S.O.E., and therefore were not covered by the guidelines. Another 168 districts were desegregating under court order. Another 1,900 districts operating dual school systems were told to submit plans of compliance with U.S.O.E. guidelines. A total of 1,500 did so by the May deadline and were judged acceptable.

Of the 400 remaining districts, 250 had proposed plans that were still being reviewed for acceptability. Another 150 had not turned in acceptable guarantees of compliance. Federal funds were terminated for 39 of these. Action to terminate funds of 64 others was begun. Such action was anticipated for 47 more.

In short, enforcement of Title VI had not touched most southern school systems with financial sanctions. And southern schools were far short of Title VI's demand for the elimination of discrimination.

Statistics on the amount of desegregation, never easy to compile, were virtually impossible to obtain during the three months after schools opened in September of 1966. Fairly elaborate arrangements were made by the Southern Regional Council prior to school opening to get reports from newspaper reporters and other reliable sources in each of the eleven southern states on the amount of desegregation. As of mid-November only three of these sources, and they included some of the best newsmen in the South, were able to obtain full statewide data. (These sources reported 9,127 or 2.9% in Louisiana; 20,436 or 5.7% in Georgia. For Mississippi, where admittance of fewer than 2,000 Negro pupils to formerly all-white schools in 1965 had been termed "massive desegregation" by the local press, the estimate was 6,244, or 2%, of the Negro school enrollment in 1966.) This unavailability to citizens of each state of the statistics of desegregation performance seemed in itself a mark of the attitude of southern education officials.

The Office of Education was compiling figures through the fall and promised a full public report. As the time for release of the federal report approached, some statewide figures began to appear in the press. Examination of Office of Education figures, once they have become available, would have to be made in terms of whether they reflect continued attendance of Negroes in desegregated schools, or merely the number of Negro children who reported to such schools the first day. Sad reports came from many parts of the South of the discouragement in various ways, most of them unkind and illegal, of many such children from continuing in their freely chosen new schools.

In an Atlanta speech, David Seeley gave the following general estimates:

South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana (the most vocal of those complaining of over-zealousness) had right around 95% or more of Negro pupils still in segregated schools. The six other states of the South had less than 90% of Negroes in segregated schools. The estimate did not state the range under 90%, but it would probably not go below 70%. In some of the border states, by contrast, at least 80% of Negro children were in integrated schools. Almost all the border states had at least 50% of Negro students in such schools. Office of Education spokesmen promised strengthened enforcement (cutting off of funds) in the five Deep South states. Of 636 school districts in those five states, 428 were required to submit desegregation plans. (The others were either under court order or had achieved elimination of dual systems.) Approximately 200 of the 428 plans were in trouble -- some having resulted in termination of funds, most under review for termination. And these, the officials made clear, were systems with the most flagrant violations. They were ones with no faculty desegregation and/or 0 to 2% of Negro pupils in desegregated schools.

The pattern in the eleven southern states seemed clear. Performance in five of them was far below any reasonable standard for achieving the abolishment of dual school systems, for achieving the law's demand that discrimination based on race cease. Performance in the other six was better, but by no means fully in compliance with the constitutional requirement to end dual school systems.

THE SOUTHERN OFFENSIVE IN CONGRESS

The very limited effect of H.E.W. Title VI enforcement was not the only development that encouraged the avoidance of Title VI's mandate in the South. Three events reflected the success of an effort in Congress to emasculate the guidelines and dilute Title VI.

First, on September 26, the Senate Appropriations Committee attached a report to the 1967 H.E.W. appropriation bill saying that the 1966 guidelines might be illegal and asking Secretary Gardner to re-examine them. The report noted that a transcript of debate on the 1964 Civil Rights Act quoted the then Senator Hubert Humphrey as saying that Title IV of the bill precluded the Office of Education's using Title VI to require an end to racial imbalance. The report also said the committee members had received many complaints about "harassment" of school officials by compliance officers.

Second, on October 10, Democratic floor leaders in both houses struck from the $6.4 billion school aid bill a provision giving special aid to schools desiring to correct racial imbalance. This move was described in the press as an attempt to appease congressmen fearful of the so-called "backlash."

Third, the same day, led by southern representatives, the House voted to amend the school aid bill by requiring a full hearing before the U.S.O.E. could withhold funds from a school district considered to be in violation of the guidelines. This amendment was later changed in conference with the Senate to say that funds may still be deferred provided a hearing is held within 60 days and a decision on complete termination reached within another 30 days. Nevertheless, the initial adoption of the amendment reflected the hostile climate of opinion and/or the degree of confusion in the House.

On October 7, at his press conference, President Johnson commented on the enforcement situation, and the issue of alleged "harassment" of southern school officials by U.S.O.E. compliance officers. His statement that in some instances there had been harassment, mistakes and "enthusiastic" people was seized upon as perhaps having ominous portent for the hopes of those who believe in full enforcement. But in context, the question and answer, as recorded in the Washington Post's transcript, would seem to assert also what southern critics of the guidelines fear most -- continued determination to enforce the law.

Q: . . . There seems to be a dispute developing between those who feel that the federal government should merely strike down legal barriers to equality and those who feel that the government should play a more positive role in encouraging integration in various facets of life.

I wonder if we could get your thinking on these two and where you stand on that argument?

A: Yes, I think the federal government must be a leader in this field and I have -- the three years I have been President -- tried, by word and action, to do everything I could to bring about equality among the races in this country and to see that the Brown decision affecting the integration of our schools was carried forward expeditiously and in accordance with the law -- to see that the civil rights acts passed in the late 50's and 60's and more recently in my Administration were carried out in accordance with the intent of Congress; that the law was fully adhered to and fully enforced at all times.

I realize that in some instances there has been some harassment, some mistakes perhaps have been made, some people have been enthusiastic, and differences have developed.

But where those mistakes have been made I think Mr. Gardner and the Commissioner of Education have been willing to always listen to any protests that might come, and to carry out the law as Congress intended it should be.

That will be the policy of our Administration: To continue to promote and to expedite the observance of the law of the land, and to see that all citizens of this country are treated equally without discrimination.

III. CONGRESSIONAL INTENT, ADMINISTRATIVE GUIDELINES AND THE CONSTITUTION

CONGRESSIONAL INTENT

The Senate Appropriations Committee, having eight southern members with great seniority and influence out of a total membership of 23, had officially raised the argument in September [in the report it attached to the H.E.W. appropriation bill] that U.S.O.E. enforcement was exceeding congressional intent. This argument had been repeatedly advanced by conservative newspaper columnists long before the Committee report. The Committee report noted then Senator Humphrey's linking of Title IV's prohibition of forced racial balances to application of Title VI. The Committee questioned whether U.S.O.E.'s use of percentages to measure progress toward ending discriminatory dual school systems was a violation of Title IV.

The interpretation of Title IV in relation to Title VI becomes crucial. Title VI, quoted earlier in this paper, clearly prohibits any discrimination subsidized by federal funds. The real question then is the meaning of Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

When the definition of desegregation in Title IV is considered as a whole rather than in part, it seems hard to question its meaning.

Title IV, Section 401 (b):

> "Desegregation" means the assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but "desegregation" shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

This definition seems aimed primarily at de jure segregation in the South, and the imbalance provision seems an obvious attempt to win legislative support among northern congressmen by proscribing one form of federal pressure against de facto segregation in northern cities. That so-called "forced busing" is the precise measure being prevented here becomes explicit in Section 407 (a) of Title IV:

> . . . nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States . . . to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another.

The appeal of southern officials to Title IV can be seen as really only an appeal to a relatively minor qualification of the whole thrust of Title IV in an effort to win northern support once again. In Title IV, the intent of Congress is clear according to Justice Department and U.S.O.E. attorneys. The major thrust of Title IV is toward "assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race," i.e., the complete and total end of segregated dual school systems. This thrust presupposes a prior de jure discrimination. For this thrust to be achieved successfully requires the reorganization and reconstitution of segregated school patterns in the South which have not just arisen de facto but have been established by state law and official educational policy. The same states and local governments (and indeed some of the same officials) which perpetuated these patterns now ask that they be legitimized under "free choice plans" without their making structural changes in those patterns. The same pattern of activity that was called separate but equal before is now often passed off as free choice.

U.S.O.E. guidelines, by enforcing Title VI, attempted also to fulfill the intent of Title IV to end school assignment based on race. Statements by Secretary Gardner on April 9 and Commissioner Howe on September 30 have cited opinions of H.E.W. and Justice Department attorneys that the guidelines are consistent with court decisions and with the intent of Congress. The guidelines insisted that gradual steps be taken to eliminate assignment of pupils on the basis of race. They tried to guard against many reported instances of intimidation and violence against Negroes who exercised their right to an education free from racial discrimination by requiring local boards to assure genuine freedom of choice. Thus, the guidelines are, according to government attorneys, consistent with the obvious intent of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Moreover, they require only token and preliminary steps toward fulfilling that intent. They do not fulfill it.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION AGAINST RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

The guidelines also seem to be in harmony with judicial interpretations of constitutional protections since 1954. While there has been no direct judgment on the guidelines, recent court comments cited below indicate their consistency with the Constitution and judicial opinion. The Constitution and decisions of the judiciary are also "the law" and the guidelines hardly go beyond them. In fact, the guidelines both lag behind some court orders and exceed others in specific items though not in the basic aim to end dual schools. The inconsistencies between court orders and guidelines on specific points have led to the following developments.

In April, the Office of Education requested federal courts to change school desegregation orders to conform with the new guidelines. The fact that the bulk of city school districts in the South, including Atlanta, New Orleans, Miami, Jackson, Montgomery, Birmingham, Nashville, Charleston, Little Rock, and Richmond, were operating under court-approved desegregation plans made the request important.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune reported on April 27 that the Justice Department made a formal proposal for a uniform school desegregation order for federal courts and asked the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans to adopt it as a model in all regional cases. The proposed order generally followed the guidelines, calling for desegregation of all public school grades by the fall of 1967 under genuine "freedom-of-choice" plans which protect students and their families from intimidation. John Doar, head of the civil rights division of the Justice Department, submitted this proposal to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. In emphasizing the need for a uniform plan, the Department of Justice cited 99 plans approved by district courts in the past ten years that then fell below federal requirements in the guidelines. This, it was argued, was unfair to districts complying voluntarily in that it rewarded with slower desegregation rate those who had resorted to litigation.

On August 16, the Fifth Circuit Court ruled that Alabama's Mobile County school desegregation plan had to be revised so that complete desegregation would be accomplished by the fall of 1967. In so doing the court held the plan approved by the federal district court to be "far short of the requirements of the law . . . Even as to those grades which, under the plan, have actually become desegregated, there is no true substance in the alleged desegregation. Less than two-tenths of one percent of the Negro children in the system are attending white schools." In the decision the court called attention to the guidelines, adding, "This appeal . . . points up, among other things, the utter impracticability of a continued exercise by the courts of the responsibility for supervising the manner in which segregated school systems break out of the policy of complete segregation into gradual steps of compliance . . . During the past 18 months pronouncements of this court have interpreted the Supreme Court's interim decisions as requiring considerably greater measures of desegregation. Thus a decision by a trial court 18 months ago is not likely to reflect the current law on the subject."

This court action and others since 1954 would seem to underscore the consistency of the guidelines with constitutional protection. Whether the guidelines implement that protection extensively enough and rapidly enough is a question suggested by this opinion of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. This question is central to evaluation of the guidelines.

THE GUIDELINES: AN EVALUATION

The guidelines must be evaluated relative to the basic goal of ending dual school systems; do they achieve the goal effectively?

In the fall of 1965, the Southern Regional Council published a report which included details of widespread harassment of Negro students who had exercised freedom of choice. That report made clear that the 1965 guidelines were inadequate to end dual school systems and to protect Negro students from violence and intimidation. The elaborate debate of the alleged excesses of the 1966 guidelines has tended to obscure the fact of continuing inadequacy of the guidelines to end dual systems this year. It has obscured the persistent attacks by terrorists and the cruel infliction of economic intimidation on Negro students and their families once again in fall, 1966. An appendix to this report documents the problem in the words of letters from Negro parents. Harassment of children in schools is another growing problem.

The following samples indicate the day in, day out ordeal of low-grade terror that is the actuality of desegregation for Negro children in some desegregated schools, not all, of course, but enough to suggest a new national scandal brewing out of the South.

In one rural Alabama county, Negro children, beaten by whites on the first day of school, refused to get off a school bus until school authorities granted them protection. Denied this protection, they remained on the bus and were suspended for staging a sit-in demonstration. A rural county system suspends for three days any student involved in a fight, regardless of who starts the fight. Four suspensions constitute expulsion and the student may not return to any school for one year. A certain faction of the student body agrees to take three-day suspensions in rotation: Four students start four fights with one Negro student. Each will be suspended for three days. The Negro gets four suspensions and is expelled, whether or not he defends himself. The Negro students, none of whom have ever been involved in a fight in ten school years, realizing what was happening after receiving three suspensions would sign a "lost and gain slip." The "lost" status withdraws the student permanently from the school but allows him to attend a Negro school with permission of the school board. To date that permission has not been granted.

The persistence of the various forms of terror against school desegregation raises in stark form the question of the adequacy of the entire guidelines approach. It may be granted that, as noted earlier, enforcement of the guidelines has been severely obstructed. The Congress not only refused to provide sufficient funds and staff but it also had southern members who supported pressure to limit the enforcement staff which was allowed. But even if they had been allowed to operate fully as planned, the guidelines tolerate practices which are far short of the intent of the law.

First, the guidelines in both 1965 and 1966 did not attempt actually to end the dual school system. They have tried only to make a beginning. In short, they accept a pattern of tokenism and gradualism. Elements in the South eagerly await a change in national pressure and policy on segregation which will allow the old ways to be reasserted. The disaffection of the 1966 Congress with rigorous enforcement is a case in point. The emergence of racism among northern white mobs has given encouragement to the advocates of resistance. Many southern segregationists believe that the rest of the country has come to agree with them on racial matters and that it will not be long before federal pressure for desegregation will dissolve.

Second, the use of percentages has been questioned by civil rights proponents. Rightly, the U.S.O.E. insisted upon substantial progress toward ending dual schools. But the percentages of desegregation which it suggested in an effort to avoid being vague about what was "substantial" left the way open for the irrelevant charges of arbitrarily forced racial balance. By building gradualism into its guidelines by the use of minimum percentages, the U.S.O.E. perhaps unwittingly allowed attention to shift from the illegitimacy of dual schools and the need to end them. Instead, southern officials haggle over whether "ten percent is too much," while continuing segregated patterns.

Third, the U.S.O.E. has at best raised doubt of whether it stands behind effective compliance officers.

Fourth, the sanction implied in Title VI, the cutoff of funds, has been extremely limited in application by the U.S.O.E. The Wall Street Journal report, cited earlier, told precisely how few defiant districts had funds terminated or deferred for "new projects." Failure even to begin action against all but the most defiant districts has been noted. These are part of a pattern which amounts to a failure to end dual schools.

Fifth, another difficulty with the whole guidelines concept is the practice of making each school district responsible for its own fate. A superintendent wishing to comply with the law is a lonely individual in the South. His predicament is made more painful by the fact that he is often under direct pressure from his constituents. The plight of one such schoolman was reported by his wife:

> Because of our relationship I have shared the deep pit of despair with him, the obscene telephone calls, and calls at four in the morning when no one would say a word . . . The verbal abuse of a few, that glint of hate in the eyes of some not willing to speak out. Letters filled with venom, some signed, some unsigned.
> It has been a long and lonely vigil, filled with great stress and anxiety. One would think we had passed the Civil Rights Act and were in sole charge of its implementation . . . .
>
> Civil rights workers have been active in this county. They have made charges, but never were they able to say, "The Negro schools are not accredited, the teachers unqualified," or that the buildings and equipment were inadequate. Caught between this group and the unreasonable segregationists, you realize how hopeless at times the situation appeared.
> I think even the two groups have wondered how much longer the superintendent, my husband, could hold out. I myself have wondered . . . .
> For political expediency the popular thing is not to support the superintendent and his efforts . . . We know.

The best example of political expediency and pressure at the state level was in Alabama where schoolmen were threatened by Governor George Wallace with a personal visit to their districts "to bring the issue to the people." The problem may be serious enough to suggest the drastic revision of Title VI enforcement policy to allow withholding federal school funds from an entire state whose officials exert overt pressure on local school boards. The issue would be this: Should federal funds go to a state which discriminates? The Civil Rights Act of 1964 says: "Compliance with any requirement adopted pursuant to this section may be effected . . . by the termination of or refusal to grant or to continue assistance under such program or activity to any recipient as to whom there has been an express finding on the record, after opportunity for hearing, of a failure to comply with such requirements, but such termination shall be limited to the particular political entity . . . ."

Sixth, another fundamental problem reflected in the guidelines controversy lies in the fact that the Office of Education was set up to coordinate national educational programs, not to be the instrument of enforcing the Civil Rights Act. It is not staffed for such duties and all the effort to wring compliance from southern schools is, of necessity, taking people and money and time away from the original purpose of the office.

Seventh, the guidelines still presuppose a dual system of schools, drawn as they are from the prevailing notion of allowing Negro children to attend white schools. One possible solution to the dual system concept, advanced by some civil rights leaders, is to require all schools in all districts that have any Negro population to have faculties consisting of 50% white and 50% Negro teachers. Only in this way, it is argued, can any real beginning be made toward eliminating the racial designations of the schools. Proponents further argue that the method might well be a partial wedge in the solution of housing problems as they pertain to the concept of neighborhood schools. For if racially motivated white parents were faced with fleeing one transitional neighborhood school with a 50-50 faculty to another with the same instructional make-up the decision to move might not be so easily made.

Finally, the guidelines themselves and as administered constitute a modification of federal policy. Whereas Title VI clearly requires that federal funds must not subsidize discrimination, the guidelines allow precisely such subsidies to continue over a period during which racial discrimination is theoretically being abolished gradually. Insofar as it has allowed time for "adjustment," the U.S.O.E. has allowed time for opposition, defiance, and evasion.

What a thorough program of enforcement (which, one suspects, would elicit the respect, however grudging, of southern officials) might be like is suggested in the following from a letter by a spokesman for the American Friends Service Committee and the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund to the Office of Education. The following section is one of seventeen, each with similar thoroughgoing questions:

What does your data reveal about the adequacy of freedom of choice plans to effectuate Title VI? In how many school districts have freedom of choice plans resulted in the elimination of dual school systems since 1964? Where, and under what conditions? In 1966, how many school districts came up to the percentages suggested in the guidelines? In how many districts and by what criteria was the performance under freedom of choice plans determined inadequate by HEW? How many districts were required to improve their performance? What kinds of suggestions for additional steps were made to them; what did they actually do, and what were the results? Where a second transfer period was held, were the results significantly increased? What has HEW done where additional efforts to implement freedom of choice plans have been ineffective? Where freedom of choice plans have not worked, how have HEW and/or local school officials determined what would work?

What has HEW learned this year about the actual operation of freedom of choice procedures? Do your data corroborate our staff experience that there continue to be considerable violations of the procedures required by the guidelines, such as inadequate notice to parents, abbreviated transfer periods, etc.? How many districts have been cited for noncompliance for those violations? The guidelines require that pupils who did not make a choice during the spring registration period should be assigned during the first week of school to the nearest school regardless of race. What happened to these students? In how many districts did this result in an increase in nonracial enrollment?

Where formerly all-white schools have become overcrowded as the result of the exercise of free choice, what has happened? How has HEW determined whether the criteria for overcrowding were uniform throughout the district? What has HEW done when Negro students have been sent back to Negro schools because of the overcrowding of desegregated schools? What has happened to white pupils where desegregated schools have become overcrowded? In how many cases, and where, has overcrowding resulted in the enrollment of white pupils in formerly all-Negro schools, either through assignment, school pairing, or some other action by school officials.

In how many school districts desegregating fewer than 12 grades did Negro pupils request transfer under the provisions enumerated in 181.71 of the guidelines? Where they were rejected, in how many cases did HEW investigate the reasons? Has much desegregation occurred as a result of these provisions?

What has been your experience with the regulation that choices are binding? How many Negro pupils sought to return to Negro schools after registering to attend desegregated schools? What happened to them?

There are clearly two schools of thought about whether freedom of choice plans should continue to be approved as acceptable devices for eliminating dual school systems. Some hold that the emphasis should be on making these plans truly free and on liberalizing the process, such as extending the choice period from 30 days to six months.

Others, and they would include the overwhelming majority of civil rights workers, have become increasingly convinced that the most honest freedom of choice plans cannot abolish dual school systems in Deep South communities. What do your findings reveal?

IV. CONCLUSIONS

1. Segments of the southern educational and political establishment successfully avoided significant desegregation in 1966. They did so in part by diverting attention in Congress from their failure in ending segregated dual systems to fears of forced racial balance.
2. The guidelines would not have ended dual schools even if perfectly applied and accepted; they were intended only as instruments for a significant beginning toward the goal of no racial discrimination. They would have made such a beginning if implemented to their 10% minimum for the Deep South. Desegregation only ranged from 2.4% to 35% of Negroes in schools with whites in the South and 2.4% to 6.6% in the Deep South. The guidelines were not fully implemented. Obviously, if "free choice" is to be effective, it must be genuinely free of intimidation and reprisal.
3. This poor performance of the South in the second year of enforcement of Title VI for school desegregation remains the strongest rebuttal of the southern complaint that the Office of Education has been overzealous in the matter. A more proper question might be whether it has been diligent enough.

4. Congress intended to end the discrimination inherent in dual school systems in Titles IV and VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, despite a prohibition of imposed racial balances. This prohibition presupposed de facto, not de jure segregation. Hence it is not relevant in the South until the pattern established by de jure segregation has been ended. In effect, Congress has ordered an end to one form of segregation while perpetuating another.

5. Political pressure on administrators, fear of white backlash, and confusion about the intent of Congress in Title IV have all weakened pressures for strong enforcement. Lack of enthusiasm for the guidelines by civil rights groups who thought them too weak must also be considered. Considering the confusion, disillusionment and detriment to effective desegregation attendant on argument about congressional intent, there would seem to be considerable need for Congress to clarify this intent.

6. The situation is retrievable if attention can be returned to the proper focus: the end of discriminatory dual school systems.

7. In December, 1966, southern schools continue to be overwhelmingly segregated. Force and violence confront many Negro students entering formerly white schools under freedom of choice plans.

More than one decade ago, the U. S. Supreme Court held that dual public school systems discriminating by race were unconstitutional on their face. The record of many southern school and public officials and the publics they serve has been one of avoiding and evading this clear-cut dictum of the basic law of the nation. Such mistreatment of the legal system by these "best people" has been far more a national disgrace and scandal than the notorious lawlessness of violent racist gangs comprised of the "worst people" of the area.

Those school and public officials who have attempted in good conscience to comply with the law as propounded by the court, reinforced by the Congress of the United States, and administered by the Office of Education deserve the praise and gratefulness of a nation whose very existence depends on a good-faith acceptance of its system of law and order. There have been many instances of beautiful and profoundly genuine acceptance of the humanity of all children in the South's school desegregation struggle. The good derived by children of both races in these situations where law has been cherished and humanity respected may prove to be among the highest achievements in the South of these traumatic years.

The tragic consequences of the continued failure of a great many southern school and public officials to live up to the basic duties of American citizenship and the common decencies observed by all mankind in the rearing of children cannot be counted. The patience of Negro Southerners (in stark counterpoint to the riotous impatience of their fellows in the North) cannot be expected to continue under intolerable conditions. The schools in the South by all statistical standards are the worst in the nation. Part of the reason for this is the extravagant waste of dual systems of segregated schools. Another part is the waste of administrative and executive energy on attempts to preserve these systems that might better be spent in improving the education of a generation which faces the complexity of a new and baffling era of the scientific age.

The difficulties of the Office of Education center on the necessity for it to enforce on a region of eleven states a law which those states ought to obey -- and indeed enforce -- as a matter of course. It is an agency not equipped or intended to enforce laws, like policemen. Far from having been overzealous, this agency has -- if the law has any meaning at all -- so far failed to achieve what the law demanded. Much of this failure has its roots in the correct assumption by the Office of Education that it must encourage and, indeed, cajole the South into assuming the responsibility that it should have shown from the beginning and must take if law in the nation is to continue to have meaning.

Announcement of stepped-up enforcement procedures by the Office of Education -- the pressing of fund termination in the most recalcitrant of southern school systems -- is, far from overzealous action, a positive and praiseworthy step, taken remarkably late. But the implications inherent in prosecution of only the most flagrant cases can only lead artful law-dodgers among southern officialdom to assume that they can continue to get by with tokenism and a show of a "cooperative" spirit.

Guidelines more closely aligned with the law's demand (perhaps a single guideline -- the abolishment of dual systems) and enforcement designed to alleviate any hope of continued contempt for the law of the land would seem the only consistent course for the future of enforcement. If this should even ultimately bring the South to a political victory that overturns the law of the land -- if the rest of the nation is that weak or that far-gone in its backlash versions of racism -- then so be it. Even that would be preferable to the continued flouting of the Constitution and the law in the schools where children learn their first lessons of citizenship and contemporary history. Already a vocal segment of the Negro movement has retreated to a demand not for integrated schools but the never-realized mandate of the "old" law -- equal separate ones. What we are talking about is the education of children -- black and white. The record to date is one of shameful disservice to them, which is to say, our nation's future.

Department of Health, Education and Welfare
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

My name is ( and I am Seventeen years of age. During the Previous year I attended an all white School here in along with my two sisters, brother and a friend. Regretfully I say that during this year we have had many obstacles in our way. I feel if more "Negroes" attend the pressures we overcome would not be as great. I have tried in all respect to encourage more young negroes my age and under to attend but fear has caused them to back out. Most of them because of jobs, they fear their parents will be fired as well as their parents.

Will you please investigate this situation?

EVASION OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION
(1964-65)

A decade of promise seemed ready for fulfillment in September, 1965. The tortuous process of school desegregation, continually before the nation's courts since 1954, at last offered promise of new dimensions and hope. The dream, embodied in Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, prohibiting "the extention of federal financial assistance to any dual or segregated systems of schools based on race, color, or national origin," was of a new era in which administration forces would take the initiative and achieve racial integration in schools. Hopefully, a sizeable proportion of the close to 98% of the South's Negro children still trapped in segregated schools would gain admission to integrated classes.

Prior to the start of the 1965 school term, the Negro school desegregation effort had met dismal failure; case after case of court-ordered desegregation hardly had made a dent in the unyielding armor of the South's segregation front. The burden of initiating suits and provoking "voluntary" change had been almost exclusively on the individual Negro pupil and his parents. With little money but firm intent, individual Negroes and several private organizations, primarily the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), found their limited resources constantly pitted against the public treasury -- local, state, and sometimes federal.

The prospect of going into almost every school district and the mounting costs for court actions were factors frustrating the school integration campaign, despite the fact that the May, 1954, U. S. Supreme Court decree was a class action purported to apply to all persons similarly situated. The mere opinions of states' attorneys are enough to bring across-the-board compliance in areas other than civil rights -- something hundreds of court suits have failed to do.

Civil rights supporters viewed school segregation among problems so serious in 1963 that some 200,000 participated in a massive March on Washington, and Congress the following year determined that legislative remedy for school desegregation was needed. This became part of the precedent-shattering Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI of the act provides that "no person . . . shall on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance." This means that the federal public education subsidy, amounting to almost 20% of the total education budget could be withheld from schools which refused to stop segregation and discrimination against Negroes. The U. S. Office of Education thus became legally obligated for the first time to address itself to the problems of school desegregation.

Big Job for Office of Education

The intent of the law was to correct hundreds of years of separate discriminatory schooling; it offered remedial action which court decisions had failed to bring. The Office of Education was charged with heavy responsibility. The mere detail of executing the responsibility within the specified time required great effort.

The task required accurate school population and attendance information against which the responsible agency might measure its success in gaining compliance with the law. The disturbing fact is that the federal government, with all its vast resources, had not ascertained the number of Negro children enrolled in formerly white schools by mid-October, 1965. Ironically, during September and October, at the very time the information was most needed, no private or government agency knew the rate of school desegregation.

The privately-sponsored Southern Education Reporting Service, which in prior years carried school desegregation figures in Southern School News, ceased publishing in July, 1965. The Office of Education collected a smattering of data in procedures resting on the voluntary contribution of information. Their efforts were thwarted largely by earlier requirements and/or permission for records on race not to be kept. At no time since 1954 has less factual information on school desegregation existed. Some state and local school officials who, when asked about desegregation, said they don't keep racial figures implied that racial data were available to local and state authorities, but not for public release.

Findings of Southern Regional Council

In trying to determine what did happen last September, the Southern Regional Council's research department enlisted the cooperation of the Office of Education, the Southern Education Reporting Service, the various state Councils on Human Relations, and others. We have supplemented this with newspaper reports, and field reports. Even with this cooperation and our determined effort, the information in spots is sketchy. But it appears to be the best data currently available.

Our compilations show that estimates released October 1 by the Office of Education overstate the rate of school desegregation. Figures of Office of Education statisticians, arrived at by use of a hurried sampling survey of 590 of the 3,300 districts in southern and border states, say that 216,600 Negroes -- 7.5% of the South's Negro pupils -- are attending classes with whites. Included in the Office of Education's total was an estimate of 15,300 in Alabama, giving that recalcitrant state ten times more than the number estimated in the Office's own "work sheet" and the number indicated by Southern Regional Council's research.

The Office of Education's estimate of desegregation in North Carolina claims 24,500 Negroes are in desegregated classes there. Southern Regional Council's research finds

8,000, only a third of what the federal agency reports. The SRC estimate may be low. There is every indication that the Office of Education figure is high. The SRC figure is based on the estimates of Southern Education Reporting Service, news clippings, and field reports of the North Carolina Council on Human Relations. When asked for state figures, a high North Carolina education official said, "Any estimates that anybody would make would be in error. We have erased the question of race from the horizon. Anything that the U. S. Office of Education says would be in error, and anything anybody in our office tells you would be in error."

The Southern Regional Council survey finds 151,409 Negroes attending desegregated public school classes in the 11 states of the Deep South -- 5.2% of the South's Negro school census. That is more than 60,000 less than the 216,600 reported by the Office of Education. The Council's finding of 717 Alabama Negro pupils in desegregated schools does not include nearly 200 Negroes who applied for transfer, under "freedom of choice" options but reportedly withdrew because of pressures and various other reasons. The Office of Education tables did not reflect a number of cases of withdrawals prior to the start of school, but this does not explain all the differences in the surveys. The four following tables show comparative state desegregation totals for 1964 and 1965.

SOURCE: Figures compiled by Southern Regional Council, Inc., from news clippings, field reports, and reports of cooperating agencies.

In the absence of accurate information on the progress of school desegregation during the first two months of the 1965-66 school year, news media resorted to educated guesses and reported the generally optimistic and exaggerated opinions of school authorities. Some estimates ran as high as 20% of the Negro school-aged population, far in excess of the true desegregation rate.

The picture appeared so rosy that the nation was lulled into a false sense of success. The truth is that nearly 95% of the South's Negro pupils still are trapped in segregated and unequal schools. The false impression is due largely to attempts by state and local school authorities, and perhaps some federal officials, to imply that school systems were desegregated beyond mere tokenism.

Even with the lack of information to measure integration progress precisely, it is clear that the move so far toward the full promise of integrated education has been a feeble step. This is despite the integrity and the sense of proper intent evident in the Office of Education.

No one has ever quite developed to the point of art the necessary techniques for parrying and thrusting with a recalcitrant state or local government bent upon thwarting the will of law. But in retrospect, it seems apparent that the Office of Education might have avoided some of the more obvious errors that others have made in the past in southern desegregation duels:

(1) As with other agencies in Washington, there was first the process of promising the ultimate and then going through the steady process of deterioration of that promise. This was unfortunate because when the Capital makes promises from high places, the lowest people in the land hear, believe and act. The reaction of disillusionment is serious and could become increasingly more serious.

(2) In many instances, frenzy in government offices seems to have been misinterpreted as satisfactory progress. Accomplishment too often was equated with the amount of energy spent. Facing such a tremendous job, which we are sure at times seemed impossible to the Office of Education staff, policy makers should have realized that new, realistic approaches were needed to get the job done.

(3) The letter and spirit of the Civil Rights Law encourage voluntary compliance if at all possible. But in the reality of the southern desegregation situation, experience has proven that skillful administration is necessary to make sure that the "volunteer" does what he claims he will do. The tendency of the Office of Education to assume otherwise -- to expect normal forthrightness and good faith in the "voluntary" compliance -- is perhaps its largest strategic error so far. The office seems not to have been fully aware of the peculiar dimensions of compliance that is "voluntary" only at the threat of the loss of a sizeable percentage of the annual budget. The most rigid checks are needed -- and have been from the beginning -- to be sure at every step of the administrative process that plans for "voluntary" action comply with all requirements of the law, and that the plans are carried out so as to meet all requirements of the law. Any other course in the South in this matter risks criticism as naive and encourages the kind of winking at the law that has been for too long a serious fault of southern society.

There would have been no need for Congress to enact legislation if there had been any validity to the highly desirable premise that most school systems would (or could) act in good faith. The experience of the federal courts revealed that the restrained decision requiring school desegregation with "all deliberate speed" failed, not because the decision lacked wisdom, but because there often was lack of good faith on the part of those against whom the edict was directed. By their words, precepts and examples, southern politicians and school officials, with few exceptions, made clear time and time again after the May 17, 1954, Supreme Court desegregation edict their intention to evade and delay.

In this kind of situation, the attitude that tokenism was an achievement and subject for civic self-congratulation grew up -- often in the best intentioned of white Southerners, including school officials.

If federal officials were naive to believe school integration in the South could be achieved without rigorous administrative checks and controls, the local school systems in the South were remarkably consistent. Evasion has continued under the Civil Rights Act, and the highly sophisticated art of misleading the federal government has continued. In order to have their grants from federal funds certified, a majority of school districts made false claims that the money would be spent on a non-discriminatory basis. Just as the claims in many instances are false, it is hard to assume other than that many of those signing the statements deliberately set out to fool those reviewing the desegregation plans.

The school systems of the South are not operating on a non-discriminatory basis. Few people expected them to be. What was expected among Negroes and in other quarters was that an honest beginning would be made to that end, with the burden of gaining compliance shifted from the shoulders of the individual Negro pupil and his parents.

For some months, it did seem as if the burden of proving compliance would rest squarely with local and state school officials. Generating this hope was the knowledge that in the area of equal employment opportunity, tangible progress was experienced only after those employers awarded government contracts were required to prove by their record that they, in fact, were complying with the federal policy for non-discriminatory hiring.

A few school superintendents acted early and in good faith toward reasonable compliance, only to have themselves placed in precarious positions by the success of neighboring districts which were permitted to undercut the vacillating guidelines of the Office of Education. When it became clear, for example, that "freedom of choice" plans would be acceptable, most school systems took this route.

Under plans based on "freedom of choice," the student and his parents theoretically could apply and expect admission to any school of their choice in the district, so long as some general requirements were met. In the event a school became overcrowded, exclusions then would be based on proximity to the school, with those living closest admitted first. Guidelines covering this explain that discrimination is practiced unless a school is desegregated, and that a system is not fully desegregated if (a) race or color is a factor in student assignment, or (b) teachers remain racially segregated, or (c) any activities or services, including transportation, remain segregated or discriminatory.

Contrary to the goals of the guidelines, choice of schools was not free for most Negroes. To many school officials, it seems to have meant a free choice to exclude Negro pupils for specious reasons, including "bad manners," "bad character," "poor record," etc.

Negroes Intimidated, Pressured

It is difficult to overstate how much hope and enthusiasm was generated among Negroes early in the year when they learned the school desegregation problem was shifting from the judicial to the administrative department of the federal government. Subsequent experience proved the amazing fact of how far down the line this enthusiasm reached into communities -- in small towns, and in rural and urban areas. Negro parents seemed for the first time to see the chance for their children to get equal education. But the start of school brought disillusionment, and it brought pressures and indignities no individuals should have to bear:

(1) Some school superintendents met with parents whose children applied for transfers from Negro to white schools and told them the Negro children probably would come home many days with black eyes from beatings the Negro parents should hold themselves responsible for.

(2) Some Negro children were threatened with demotion or loss of units.

(3) Negro teachers in some districts were threatened with dismissal if Negro children transferred.

(4) In some instances, the names and addresses of Negroes applying for transfers to white schools were published, thus inviting intimidation of Negro families.

(5) Some systems mailed out information on "freedom of choice" arrangements for white parents, encouraging them to claim all vacancies prior to the notifying of Negroes about the free-choice compliance plan.

(6) Special affidavits, conferences, and/or employment information were required of Negro parents whose children sought transfers to white schools in some districts.

(7) Cross-burnings, shooting into Negro homes, and other acts of intimidation were used to force withdrawal of Negro students from some systems. (Surely, the Civil Rights Act in some way must be applied to protect citizens from such as this.)

Tokenism Brings More Demonstrations

The sum of these experiences to concerned Negroes and private organizations working with them added up to more frustration and distrust of constituted legal authority on the federal as well as the local and state levels. The loss of confidence in the commitment and will of the federal government to force full compliance with the Civil Rights Act, and the acceptance of un-free "freedom of choice" compliance plans have led to a situation in which militant civil rights groups are beginning again to take to street demonstrations, as in Crawfordville, Georgia, seeking redress of grievances.

Obviously, decisions were made to accept token effort at compliance in some recalcitrant sections. Dual law and dual policies -- one for sections with few Negroes and another for sections with large numbers of Negroes -- should not be. In other words, the Office of Education would seem to have erred in accepting two-grades-a-year plans in some Mississippi districts. Excepting these districts from the desegregation guidelines issued by the federal agency only prolongs and makes more laborious the process. The only way to desegregate is to desegregate. And the proof of compliance with any desegregation order is in the ability of schools to show that Negroes are in classes with whites in reasonable proportion.

The best measure of this desegregation would be on a class-to-class basis in every school in the various systems. That also is the best way to avoid transfers of white children from one school to another in search of an institution that had evaded the law, as was the case in Taliaferro County, Georgia, where all of the white children were transferred to schools outside the county (see attached editorial, page 23).

For some reason, there appears to be the thinking in the federal government that it is not within federal power to take the initiative to achieve compliance and correction of racial separation in schools, despite the fact that both the 1954 Supreme Court decision and the 1964 Civil Rights Act provide for school desegregation.

Enforcing law requires initiative. Federal officials use administrative fiat to enforce law in many areas. Administration is effecting policy and should not be circum-scribed by bureaucratic caution so long as the administrative acts are within the scope of the spirit and letter of the law.

Greater Effort Needed

It would be foolhardy to blame any individual or agency for the sorry progress of desegregation. It is common knowledge that any Office of Education official is confronted with the working conditions of bureaucracy and that actions of the Office of Education might be torpedoed by others in state, federal, and local positions.

It is hardly the fault of the Office of Education, for example, that little or no budget was provided for administration of Title VI funds, or that the few staffers who could be hired had to be brought on the payroll too late to do the job adequately. (Perhaps the White House and Congress share some of the blame for this.) We know that the few dedicated Office of Education staffers were overworked and vulnerable to the evasive tactics of many southern school superintendents and school boards. Consequently, we are sympathetic with the Office of Education's plight, though critical of what was accomplished. We have the advantage of hindsight in examining the problems. With these experiences and insights, we suggest the following changes:

(1) The "freedom of choice" concept (as practiced) should not be accepted on face value as a method of achieving desegregation in the South. There cannot be freedom where parents and children are intimidated for exercising a choice.

(It is ironic that we are hearing much criticism of "freedom of choice" in the southern region at the very time northern minority groups are fighting for it to rid their section of de facto and de jure segregation. We do not choose in this report to assess the pros and cons of the principle of freedom of choice, or to try to untangle the semantic snarls that have developed in the phrase. It might be acceptable if properly administered. But as it is being applied in the South, it is an inadequate doctrine for even minimal compliance with the Civil Rights Act. Indeed, the choice has not been free for the Negro children to select schools they want to attend in the South.)

(2) Administrative fiat and decades of following laws and traditions now adjudged unconstitutional created the school segregation problem, and administrative fiat and pressures must be used to correct it. School superintendents, if placed in the position of demonstrating to the satisfaction of federal agencies that funds are being spent without regard to race, would be found encouraging Negroes to attend formerly white schools in many instances. A handful of superintendents already are doing this and are justifying their actions by using the federal mandate as an excuse.

(3) Where local officials refuse to comply, funds should be cut off in accordance with procedures outlined in the Civil Rights Act. Thought should be given to the question of assuming responsibility for the education of children where such fund cut-offs occur. Government sponsored conferences in the few states where this is possible might study the possibility of temporary state option or trusteeship if local sponsorship is abandoned. And the Justice Department should be alerted for the possible initiation of legal action.

(4) In the absence of sufficient federal examiners to police the performance of school desegregation on district levels, technical assistance grants should be made to teams of professionals who could be recruited and co-sponsored by colleges and universities, civil rights groups, and/or the government, to review and challenge performance in integrating school systems. Complaints from local organizations should get quick follow-up by the Office of Education, including progress reports to complainants.

(5) Surveys should be made in all districts to determine the proportion of Negro school children, and the reissuance of Office of Education guidelines should indicate that a sizeable proportion of Negro children in racially mixed classes on all grade levels is needed for local systems to show proper performance in desegregation.

(6) If the Office of Education is going to continue permitting phased desegregation plans (as four grades a year for a three-year period), it should not allow token desegregation in the four grades chosen to be integrated.

(7) Briefing and information sessions sponsored under technical assistance should be held for all teachers in all Deep South schools. At assemblies or by use of educational television, for example, some teachers might be taught how to pronounce the word, N-E-G-R-O, and how to lessen the isolation of individual Negro students in predominantly white classes until this undesirable situation itself can be corrected. And Negro teachers of white youngsters might be taught how to deal with them. This would be a minimal, emergency approach and should not preempt any other technical assistance programs.

(8) Some special scrutiny should be given school systems which are under court orders to desegregate. Some are finding court orders advantageous for slow desegregation progress. For example, Clarendon County, South Carolina, which has been dickering in the courts for 16 years, had only five Negroes attending school with whites in 1964. The Office of Education admits it does not know how many Negroes in Clarendon attend desegregated classes during the current 1965 school year.

As it was stated by the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Price v. Denison Independent School District on July 2, 1965: "By the 1964 Act and the action of HEW /the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare/, administration /of the law/ is largely where it ought to be -- in the hands of the executive and its agencies with the function of the judiciary confined to those rare cases presenting justifiable, not operational, questions."

The most important thing to be remembered as the executive branch continues with its responsibility for desegregating schools is included in the Office of Education's policy statement and guidelines:

"The responsibility to eliminate segregation rests with the school authorities and is not satisfied by rules and practices which shift the burden of removing discrimination to the class or classes of persons previously discriminated against."

The Issue At Crawfordville

Unlike Birmingham, St. Augustine, Selma and Hayneville, the civil rights issue at Crawfordville, Ga., has not touched the American conscience. It hasn't because the headline questions already have been settled and the American people know it. Die-hard segregation, even to the extent of abandoning public education, just won't be permitted in the United States.

But in Crawfordville, the subtler forms of enforcing white supremacy have come to the surface and they have yet to be countered.

It was no surprise when a federal court this week declared Taliaferro County's schools bankrupt and turned them over to Georgia Superintendent Claude Purcell with instructions to end segregation. The county's efforts to preserve segregation by closing its white schools and sending all white students to other counties was doomed from the start. If Crawfordville's leaders didn't know that, eastern Georgia must be more isolated from the nation than the state's generally moderate record on the race issue would indicate.

The unresolved question raised at Crawfordville is whether racists will be allowed to use economic reprisals in their last-ditch efforts to preserve the status quo.

TALIAFERRO COUNTY'S schools will be reopened, but will the Negro principal and five teachers fired from Negro schools since the demonstrations began be rehired?

Will the two Negro bus drivers, two school cooks and two custodians get their jobs back?

Will the 22 parents of children in the demonstrations be rehired after firings from their various jobs in Crawfordville?

Will the six families evicted from their homes be allowed to return?

Will the demonstrator victims of four sudden foreclosures be given another chance?

SNARLING DOGS, Klan sheriffs and children locked out of schools have helped America move rapidly along the road toward equal opportunities for all its citizens. The kinds of economic pressures employed in Crawfordville are much less dramatic, but paralyzingly effective.

The next step in the civil right struggle is to deny to those who still shout "Never!" the economic weapons long used against Negroes and tested anew at Crawfordville.

Dr. King's New Test in an Old Town

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The Rev. Martin Luther King marched up to the pink-and-white Monson Motor Lodge and Restaurant just in time for lunch. The manager, James Brock, waited on the steps for Mr. King and his party of eight.

"We have come for lunch," Mr. King said.

"We are not integrated here," the manager told him. "I must ask you to leave." But the man who broke the color line in Birmingham had a few things to say, and he and Mr. Brock (who is president of the Florida Hotel and Motel Association) stood out front and debated the philosophy of civil rights for almost 20 minutes.

"I am sure you don't understand the humiliation our people have to go through," Mr. King said. Replied the restaurateur: "You realize it would be detrimental to my business to serve you here. I have had to have 84 people arrested here since Easter."

'I Invite My Friends'

Mr. Brock smiled into a waiting television camera, and stepped closer to an expectant microphone. "I would like to invite my many friends throughout the country to come to Monson's. We expect to remain segregated." Someone inside called the police.

Just then, a stocky young white man in an open-necked white shirt bumped reporters aside as he hurried into Monson's for lunch. In the shoving, Dr. King got bumped, too, but by now the conversation on the steps was over. The police arrived to take the president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to jail for the 13th time since he joined the racial wars in 1955.

The arrest, under a Florida law authorizing an innkeeper to evict an unwanted guest, was the first for Dr. King since Birmingham. But it wasn't the first civil-rights arrest in St. Augustine, a tiny sun-washed Atlantic city of 11,000 persons, settled at the spot where the Spanish explorer Don Juan Ponce de Leon landed in his search for the Fountain of Youth in 1513.

Nor was it the only civil-rights arrest last week in the South; the first full week of June produced the first of the summer's promised racial turmoil.

Police fired tear gas and streams of water into a Negro church in Tuscaloosa, Ala., after demonstrators pelted cops with bricks, bottles, and pieces of smashed furniture. Officers ripped placards from the hands of Negro pickets in the City Council chamber in Austin, Texas. Pickets paraded past segregated restaurants in Dallas.

But most of the week's civil-rights headlines were written over stories with a St. Augustine dateline—and that's the way that Dr. King, the master draftsman of street strategy, planned it.

He makes it plain that St. Augustine is to be his "new Birmingham." He promises to bring "a nonviolent army" to St. Augustine. The campaign here, in fact, will be his first concentrated effort to knock down the color line since his marchers confronted "Bull" Connor's fire hoses in Birmingham's Kelly Ingram Park. St. Augustine presents an entirely different target.

Birmingham had laws on its books requiring segregation; St. Augustine has none. Birmingham's employers had closed most highly skilled industrial jobs to Negro applicants; St. Augustine has few such jobs for anyone.

Little Interest in Marching

Perhaps most important of all, the 2,700 Negroes in St. Augustine are poorly organized, and poor as well. Many are obviously not much interested in the noisy marches down King Street to the Plaza of the Ancient City, a park in the center of town where most of the action is.

So why St. Augustine? Dr. King answered this question himself when he and his staff first moved into control of the campaign three weeks ago: "St. Augustine was picked not because it is the most segregated city but because it is the oldest, and therefore symbolic."

White leaders here are blunter. "King is trying to ride the publicity on St. Augustine's 400th birthday party," says one businessman. Adds another: "We're doing a lot more for integration than a lot of other Florida towns, but we depend on visitors, so we're easier to blackjack. It doesn't take a smart man to figure out who to pick on."

St. Augustine's birthday party, which begins in earnest in January, is the big topic of conversation in the coffee shops and stores along Cathedral and King Streets, the two main avenues of St. Augustine commerce—and the man who wants to spoil the party is considered a villain, indeed.

The civil-rights campaign here glitters with ironies for those who look for them. The gathering place for the demonstrators is the old slave market overlooking the incredibly blue Matanzas Bay; in the old days most of the slaves brought to the United States were sold in this market.

St. Augustine was 40 years old when the English settled Jamestown, 55 years old when the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, 210 years old when John Hancock and his friends signed the Declaration of Independence. Most of the original town still stands. Built of coquina, a shellrock stripped from an open quarry across the bay, the buildings have weathered to a pleasing antique brown. It's the oldest city in the United States.

The massive Castillo de San Marcos, past Big Daddy's Blue Goose, a favorite Negro bar.

Dr. King was taken to jail in Jacksonville just before this demonstration "for security reasons"; Gov. Farris Bryant signed the transfer order. Dr. King left town in a police car, guarded by four deputies and a big dog that rode in the front seat with him. There had been vague new threats on his life all day.

Few were surprised when, not long ago, the mother of the governor of Massachusetts was arrested when she, with a group of civil-rights demonstrators, sought to eat supper at a white-only motor lodge. In one week, 284 demonstrators were arrested.

Yet, even here, whites have given ground. The St. Johns County Board of Public Instruction has tripled the number of Negro pupils assigned to once all-white schools. Only 19 won admission to these schools (1 to the high school, 6 to the junior high school, 12 to 2 elementary schools), but that's 13 more than last year when the color bar fell for the first time.

And not all restaurants and motels refuse to accept Negro guests. Nobody really knows how many will and how many won't; the number changes constantly, and this is, perhaps, part of the trouble. "I offered to drive one demonstrator to an integrated restaurant if he would leave the one where he was," a deputy sheriff says, honestly puzzled. "But he told me he wasn't interested in eating anything."

Dr. King insists his goal is total victory. This was his vow in Birmingham, and he settled for a good deal less than total victory. And the hold-out white businessmen seem far more determined to hold out here than in Alabama, although they were negotiating with Negro leaders at week's end.

James Brock, the manager who called the police to arrest Dr. King, carries a shotgun, a pistol, a billy club, and a flash light as a member of the sheriff's nightly downtown patrol. There are others.

The first riots of the 1964 season, 35 miles away in Jacksonville, aroused this determination, and two unrelated events have stiffened it. The Jacksonville riots grew from demonstrations that clearly got out of hand; for two days and nights young Negro toughs roamed through Jacksonville breaking windows, stoning passing cars, tossing fire bombs, and turning in false fire alarms. Negro leaders quickly disowned them, calling them "the mob behind the marchers," young hooligans taking advantage of the demonstrations to settle private grudges. Jacksonville police agreed they were mostly members of gangs who usually fight among themselves.

What Fanned Passions

But the Jacksonville riots enraged many whites here, and these passions were kept alive by a bitter gubernatorial primary election campaign between the mayor of Jacksonville, the local favorite running off nighttime marches; the town fathers are being rougher on white toughs.

Perhaps Dr. King's ace is the Federal civil-rights bill, now almost certain to become Federal law. Many holdouts here say they will accept Negroes without further protest when compelled by law. This might be the first enforcement test.

Loser the Last Time Out

Dr. King and his organization need a new and winning cause if his prestige in the civil-rights movement is not to be swallowed by younger newcomers. He was the hero of Birmingham, but in his last time out, at Danville, Va., he was clearly a loser.

The obstacle in St. Augustine is not so much white resistance as a lack of clear, immediate goals. Short of to-the-letter enforcement of a strong Federal civil-rights law, there will be no total desegregation of restaurants and motels.

Jobs? Negroes are employed already in the menial service jobs; most of the porters, busboys, and clean-up men are Negroes now. There are few jobs of any other kind in a town where most residents make their living from tourism.

Schools? The line is broken already; school integration in St. Johns County is token integration, but there are no all-white schools.

But if this makes victory more difficult, it also fuzzes the line between victory and defeat. Any concession at all, to the Negroes of St. Augustine, will be better than nothing at all. Total victory, somewhat out of American fashion at the moment anyway, may be more than Dr. King can hope for. But St. Augustine is not likely ever to be quite the same again.

time commerce—and the man who wants to spoil the party is considered a villain, indeed.

It's the oldest city in the United States.

The massive Castillo de San Marcos, a Spanish fort, guards the ocean approach to the town, but it has been burned twice (by Sir Francis Drake in 1586 and English troops from the Carolinas in 1702) and sacked once (in 1668) by English pirates.

An Attack and a Solution

And now, in the view of most whites here, comes the threat of the most fearsome assault of all: An attack from the landward side by a Negro interloper from Atlanta. The Negroes hold an entirely different view; they see Dr. King as the man who has the solution to all their problems.

This is Ku Klux Klan country, Florida's rural upstate that is far closer kin to south Georgia, which it adjoins, or Alabama, which isn't far away, than the bustling citrus and space cities of the southern half of the state. Indeed, St. Johns County Sheriff A. L. Davis, who commands all law-enforcement agencies assigned to the county, concedes that he might have unknowingly signed up Klansmen as special deputies to keep the peace during the street marches.

More than 400 whites, many of them Klansmen, marched through the Negro section of town in the early morning hours of Saturday. They were escorted by worried cops and police dogs straining at leashes. Negroes greeted them with a large banner, proclaiming "Welcome—Peace and Brotherhood to You." A few Negroes even applauded at one turn, but a hail of rocks zinged out of the darkness as the marchers tramped

The first riots of the 1964 season, 35 miles away in Jacksonville, aroused this determination, and two unrelated events have stiffened it. The Jacksonville riots grew from demonstrations that clearly got out of hand; for two days and nights young Negro toughs roamed through Jacksonville breaking windows, stoning passing cars, tossing fire bombs, and turning in false fire alarms. Negro leaders quickly disowned them, calling them "the mob behind the marchers," young hooligans taking advantage of the demonstrations to settle private grudges. Jacksonville police agreed they were mostly members of gangs who usually fight among themselves.

What Fanned Passions

But the Jacksonville riots enraged many whites here, and these passions were kept alive by a bitter gubernatorial primary election campaign between the mayor of Jacksonville, the local favorite running as a segregationist, and the mayor of Miami, running as a civil rightist. The local favorite won.

Finally, an incident in St. Augustine clinched the case with many whites who believe Dr. King's demonstrators are irresponsible law-breakers. A 21-year-old Negro man was arrested for plotting to extort $10,000 from a prominent St. Augustine mother; she said a Negro man warned her he would blow up her home and kill her 4 ill children unless she put $10,000 in a sack and left it on the flour shelf at a St. Augustine supermarket.

The man, who was arrested by FBI agents who said they stopped him as he left the store with the decoy sack, had been arrested 16 times as a civil-rights demonstrator, charged with violating Florida's trespass law. He has also been convicted of armed robbery.

There's no proof, nor any evidence, of a connection between the suspect and Dr. King's organization, but it strengthens segregationist sentiment. Add this to Negro outrage over the attempted burning of a cottage at nearby Anastasia Hills, rented by Dr. King, and it comes up an emotional stand-off of the warring groups.

On the Police Blotter

There's more flailing of fists, person-to-person violence here than Birmingham saw during all the weeks before the final confrontation between "Bull" Connor and Martin Luther King. The St. Augustine blotter produced these items in the space of three days:

- A Negro man was peppered with birdshot by "persons unknown" as he walked along darkened King Street near the downtown plaza.
- A white man stumbled across two Negro men under a bridge across the San Sebastian River; they cut his face with a pocket knife and left him bleeding and alone.
- A hooligan forced the door on Dr. King's cottage and set fire to a blanket, which went out before it could set other furnishings ablaze; the next night the house was peppered with shotgun fire.
- An out-of-town photographer was knocked to the ground by a man with a nightstick (the sheriff said he wasn't a deputy); another newsman was beaned with a well-aimed brick.

It Could Have Been Worse

But for St. Augustine's snarling police dogs, the violence might be worse. The dogs and their handlers have, more than once, kept a tiny no-man's land between the lines of demonstrators and white counter-demonstrators. So far, no one has complained about police-dog brutality in St. Augustine.

In fact, Dr. King had kind words for the police at week's end. He said he had noticed "improved law enforcement" since the sheriff's men were reinforced with state troopers sent in by Gov. Farris Bryant, who vowed to keep the streets free of violence.

But, as tiny as it is, as unlikely a scene as this old-world town presents in the drowsy afternoon's sun, the tinder of terrible trouble is here. Both sides seem to be aware of it. White and Negro adults broke up downtown fights between white and Negro youths. Dr. King has called

EDITOR'S NOTE—A tenuous peace has, at length, come to St. Augustine. But its recent racial disorders have shaken the very structure of the town. With more civil rights demonstrations inevitable throughout the South, a look at tortured St. Augustine offers a study in what happens to a city caught unprepared.

By JULES LOH

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla., July 4 (AP) — Weathered old missions and crusty green cannons and venerable oaks standing in ancient courtyards give the impression that St. Augustine is centuries past the point where any force at all could shake its social stability.

But St. Augustine has gone through a full-blown civil rights struggle, and today it trembles in anxiety as it once rocked with violence.

The struggle has so torn the city that only a delicate thread —in the form of a secret biracial committee — is holding its social fabric together and the struggle, many fear, is far from over.

And as the "long hot summer" moves inevitably toward promised large and small demonstrations across the South, St. Augustine, holding its breath in the uneasy calm of a tenuous truce, offers a study in what can happen to a city unprepared for what has come to be known as "nonviolent direct action."

ALREADY St. Augustine has been racked economically. Chamber of Commerce Manager H. B. Chitty estimates a loss of $8 to $10 million dollars in the city's annual tourist income of $22 million. Hansoms and surries normally clopping busily about with sightseers, stand idly in a long line on the riverfront. Some businessmen have thrown up their hands. At one motel there were 20 cancellations in a single day.

But economic woes are only part of St. Augustine's agony. "We've lost control of our city," said innkeeper Eddy Mussallem. "We've become a battle ground for extreme elements on both sides."

State Sen. Verle Pope, who at one point tried to mediate the dispute and got a brick through his office window for his efforts, says new state laws might be the answer.

"When two groups come in and both make demands incapable of fulfillment it tears a city apart," Pope said. "Some legislation has got to be designed to prevent demonstrators, Negro and white, from destroying a town."

AT A PRIVATE meeting in which motel and restaurant operators voted to comply with the civil rights bill, one man stood up during the debate and shouted, "If we do that, they're going to break every window in this town."

He referred to groups of whites, characterized by their battered old cars with Confederate flags whipping from aerials, who still cruise the streets surrounding the Slave Market Plaza where preachers of white supremacy held forth nightly during the period of turmoil before the truce.

Perhaps the most damaging results of the racial conflict to St. Augustine's future are the animosities splitting the white community, born of high passion during the demonstrations and fanned by bitterly conflicting views among civic leaders on how to deal with them.

Rapport between Negroes and whites has suffered. "I'm tired of being cussed at and called 'Nigger" every place I go," complained a worker at the St. Augustine Alligator Farm. "Folks didn't used to behave that way."

INDEED FOLKS DIDN'T. Back in the twenties the town's leading beautician was a Negro woman named Carrie Macon. One of the directors of the St. Augustine National Bank, Will Martin, also was a Negro, and Negro and white baseball teams used the same dressing rooms at the city ball park.

But that was also a period in which Negro education, according to one old timer, "was sorely neglected." The Negroes' position in St. Augustine steadily deteriorated over the years.

The first incident leading up to the present crisis came two years ago when a group of students from Florida Normal, a Negro college, staged a sit-in at a dime store. As police were escorting them out, a white youth slugged one of them.

A year ago last spring a committee of Negroes headed by Dr. R. B. Hayling appeared before the city commission with a list of demands. The commission refused to act on any of them. Then, in a move interpreted by many as a gratutious gesture of intransigence, the commission passed an ordinance prohibiting fishing from the bridge over the Matanzas River. Few if any whites ever fished there.

NO VIOLENCE BUT WADE IN AREA IS BLOCKED OFF BY STATE POLICE
Only Few Segregationists on Hand as Wade In Proceeds With Minor Incidents

The tempo of Negro demonstrations picked up. White tempers grew short.

THEN ONE HOT night last fall the Ku Klux Klan held a rally in a pasture 6 miles out of town Dr. Hayling showed up and was roundly beaten — "initiated" as one Klansman put it. A short time later, a car full of white youths drove into the Negro section. The car was shot into and one youth was killed. In the nights that followed there were sporadic incidents of shooting.

Again a Negro committee approached the city commission and again there was no action.

And that was when Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference agreed to come to St. Augustine. Dr. King didn't miss the symbolic value of demonstrations in the nation's oldest city.

He preached to the St. Augustine Negroes in their stifling hot churches where they gathered to sing the old slave songs, mournful and sweet, and the new civil rights songs, spirited and challenging.

He told them to purify themselves, to "prepare to offer your very bodies for freedom and be ready to be clubbed and kicked without retaliating." Then he led them into the streets.

FOR A FORTNIGHT the city was in the grip of terror. The Negro demonstrations brought on counterdemonstrations by whites, most of them sun-burnished youths wearing denims, work shoes and soiled shirts, and carrying 39-cent Confederate flags.

Some were members of the Ancient City Hunting Club, a group headed by Holsted (Hoss) Manucy, a hulking segregationist who wore a black polo shirt, boots and a cowboy hat and kept in contact with his forces through roving cars equipped with citizens' band radio.

Two other segregationist leaders also came to town: J. B. Stoner of Atlanta, a lawyer who represents the KKK; and the Rev. Connie Lynch, a wiry evangelist from San Bernardino, Calif., who said his denomination was the Church of Jesus Christ Christian and his message was that Jesus Christ died to redeem white people only.

At night, Lynch and Stoner would speak beneath the old pavilion, where slaves once were sold in the palm-fringed town plaza. One night Mr. Lynch had with him on the platform a drawing of a grotesque, ape-like creature with the crude lettering: "Do you want your children to look like this?"

The clashes would come when the Negroes marched, two by two, from their churches down to the plaza.

At the sight of them, a cry would go up, "Niggers coming!" With that, women would screech, "Go git 'em, boys; And masses of whites shouting obscenities, would surge from one corner of the plaza to another as the Negro line wound around the square. At times, they broke through, and you could hear beneath the screeching and cursing the sickening thud of fists against flesh.

UNTIL Gov. Farris Bryant sent in the Highway Patrol to take over law enforcement, there was virtually no police protection for the demonstrators. During one of the white counterdemonstrations, the local sheriff, who said he had been a close friend of Hoss Manucy's for 40 years, marched in the parade.

But violence wasn't confined to the plaza, nor to the night hours. On the beach during the day, whites would try to keep the Negroes out of the Atlantic, and the same screaming, flailing disorder erupted.

A favorite target of the segregationists were the white demonstrators, standing out vividly in the line of march. The segregationists called them "white niggers."

At one wade-in, an Episcopal rector from Farmingdale, N.J., 50-year-old Rev. Walter Hampshire, knelt in the sand and started to pray.

"Hey, white nigger, look here, look here!" one white shouted.

Amid an explosion of expletives, a blow on the head sent the minister sprawling in the shallow foam. Two young Negroes flung themselves on his body and accepted more blows.

Repercussions of the violence spread from the Matanzas River to the Potomac.

IN A SMALL HOUSE next to the First Baptist Church one night after a free-for-all on the plaza, Dr. King phoned first the Department of Justice and then the White House.

"We need help now," he pleaded.

Meanwhile, the St. Johns County Grand Jury had heard

"Hap[illegible]e Tag"

four days of testimony and had come up with a plan which would have formed a biracial committee. But it also called for a 30-day cooling-off period, and this Dr. King rejected.

When the grand jury plan fell through, President Johnson phoned H. E. Wolfe, a wealthy St. Augustine contractor and friend of politicians, and asked him to serve on a biracial committee of four. Wolfe at first declined, then accepted after a call from Gov. Bryant. But this effort, too, fell through, apparently because one of the two Negroes named wasn't acceptable to one side.

Finally, after a series of conference phone calls, Gov. Bryant announced he had appointed a biracial committee, but would not tell who was on it to save them harrassment. The Negroes agreed to a two-week truce while the committee worked.

If some of the segregationists in the plaza thought the truce was tantamount to capitulation, the Negroes plainly felt it was a triumph. Back at the First Baptist Church, they gathered to clap and sing and one of the songs went like this:

"This little light of freedom,
oh Lord,
"I'm going to let it shine,
"I'm going to let it shine,
"You can tell ol' Hoss Manucy
"[illegible] I'm going [illegible] let it shine."

Critical Test for the Nonviolent Way

In St. Augustine, Martin Luther King has put his doctrine of nonviolence on trial. By making it succeed there, he hopes to win over those Negroes now veering toward extremism.

By JOHN HERBERS

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla.

WHEN the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. moved his forces into St. Augustine on May 25, the Negro revolution had reached a critical stage. A new militancy by both Negroes and segregationists was on the rise.

In Jacksonville, Nashville, Atlanta and other cities, civil rights demonstrators had departed from their policy of nonviolence. The moderate Negro leaders who had so ably succeeded in placing the black man's cause before the conscience of America seemed in danger of losing control of the movement.

The white backlash stirred up by Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama in three Northern Presidential primaries was at a peak. Many whites sympathetic to the cause of racial justice were beginning to fear that the Negro in his demands for "Freedom now! Freedom now!" was about to pull the pillars of society crashing down around us all.

One was reminded of the lines written about the Negro drive by Thomas Merton, the Trappist monk:

"It is . . . possible that as the movement gains in power, the reasonableness and the Christian fervor . . . will recede into the background and the movement will become more and more an unreasoning and intransigent mass movement dedicated to the conquest of sheer power, more and more inclined to violence."

EVERYWHERE there was growing uncertainty and concern about where the movement was headed. While the civil rights bill was virtually assured of passage sometime during the summer, no realistic appraisal of the forthcoming law could find in it more than a broadening of the legal base for Negro opportunity. Civil rights leaders everywhere were predicting a "long hot summer of discontent."

"We felt," Dr. King said as he set up his headquarters here, "that the summer campaign needed a purifying prelude in the sense of having a movement where Negroes remained completely nonviolent."

St. Augustine is a critical test not only of Dr. King's ability to hold the imagination and allegiance of millions of Negroes but also of the nonviolent method.

It soon became apparent why Dr. King and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference had picked St. Augustine, the nation's oldest city, a seemingly inappropriate locale, as the starting point for the summer campaign.

The little city of 15,000, 35 miles south of Jacksonville, is not typically Southern and, like American society, as a whole, it presents a series of paradoxes. Accessible by land and sea, it is on the main tourist route of Florida. It looks to outsiders for 80 per cent of its economy, and its people come from all parts of the nation. As the first permanent settlement in the United States, it is one of the nation's chief historic sites. In 1962 President Kennedy appointed a special commission to work on the city's quadricentennial in 1965. Plans call for the establishment of a Pan-American Center that will serve as a window on the world of Latin America, of which St. Augustine was a part for more than 200 years.

YET, politically and socially, St. Augustine is by any objective analysis a backwater area which has not only rejected Latin America's racial tolerance but also the North American dream that all men should start with equal opportunities.

Historian Charles Arnade has said that white leaders of the city are forever looking long- (Continued on Page 30)

Critical Test for the Nonviolent Way

ingly backward into history. "They are crazy for genealogy. They all try to trace their relatives back 200 or 300 years. It is a closed society that is suspicious of anybody from the outside and of any ideas."

The little city is a stronghold for the far right. The John Birch Society and similar organizations flourish. One of their main themes is that the civil rights movement and Communism are analogous, a view that is readily accepted by the poor whites who are the activists in the racial struggle.

YET St. Augustine is far from being the most segregated city in the South. As in most coastal communities, you can find Negroes and whites living side by side. The schools have token integration, municipally owned facilities are desegregated, and a few Negroes serve as law-enforcement officers.

What does stand out clearly in St. Augustine, however, is that further racial progress is blocked—not so much by local law and massive resistance as by terror.

Gangs of white toughs from the swamps and byways of St. Johns County are free to roam the city, attacking Negro demonstrators and white sympathizers. Holsted Richard (Hoss) Manucy, a 45-year-old former bootlegger, heads a force of men called "Manucy's Raiders," whose main function is to terrorize the community's 3,500 Negroes and who patrol the streets in cars equipped with short-wave radios.

White businessmen who have tried to bring about voluntary desegregation of public accommodations or to set up a biracial committee to negotiate a settlement have had their windows broken. Homes and automobiles have been fired on and scores of Negroes have been beaten.

Manucy's men have not only been tolerated but a number were sworn in as special deputies to deal with racial demonstrations before a Federal judge denounced this practice. When Negro leaders are taken to jail, the man who opens the door for them is Hoss Manucy, 220 pounds of him, grinning under a battered cowboy hat.

Several juveniles were sent to the State Reformatory last year for indefinite terms after they had been arrested while picketing a lunch counter and after their parents had refused to sign statements saying the youngsters would take no further part in racial protests. Four Negroes were beaten at a Ku Klux Klan rally.

It was in this setting that Dr. King called for a return to the classical technique of nonviolence in which the Negro freely gives himself to the violence of the white man. The hope is that the oppressor may come to see his own injustice and not only free the oppressed but redeem himself and society in the process.

"The Negro," Dr. King wrote in "Why We Can't Wait", his latest book, "was willing to risk martyrdom in order to move and stir the social conscience of his community and the nation. Instead of submitting to surreptitious cruelty in thousands of dark jail cells and on countless street corners, he would (with acts of civil disobedience) force his oppressor to commit his brutality openly—in the light of day—with the rest of the world looking on."

VIGILANTE — Holsted Manucy leads "Manucy's Raiders," a white group that patrols St. Augustine.

IN St. Augustine this has happened. Most of the brutality occurred not during acts of civil disobedience, as in Birmingham and other cities, but during lawful demonstrations in the street and at a public beach segregated not by law but by extra-legal intimidation.

The white man came more than halfway to offer up his violence, almost as if he were acting out the role assigned to him. But is this likely to lead to acceptance of the Negro's demands for desegregation in public accommodations and to creation of a biracial committee to hear Negro grievances and to better job opportunities for Negroes?

It would not at first sight seem so. Dr. King and his nonviolent army, rather than the angry whites in the town square, are seen as the aggressors by community leaders.

"All America and all the world knows that St. Augustine is unjustly being used as a battleground," two officials of the quadricentennial program, W. I. Drysdale and Frank Upchurch, said in a joint statement. "And everyone everywhere knows that it was chosen for its publicity value and because of its helplessly small size against such nationwide organizations [as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.]

"But let no one misunderstand," they continued. "St. Augustine does not plan on rolling over and playing dead. It has survived 400 years only because it has been a decent and strong-willed community. And, God willing, it will be such 400 years from now."

IN his eight years as a national civil rights leader, Dr. King has grown accustomed to this kind of response—a hardening of opposition rather than a move toward reconciliation. He sees it as a temporary and localized impediment in the over-all advance of the Negro movement.

It is difficult to believe that Dr. King is only 35 years old (he was born Jan. 15, 1929), not because of his appearance but because of the veneration in which he is held by his associates and followers.

"The good Lord doesn't make a Martin Luther King every day," one aide told St. Augustine's Negroes. "If he come down here and go jail, the least you can do go with him."

Dr. King was hardly out Boston University with a torate in systematic theo when he rose to national prominence by leading the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott of 1956, an assignment he accepted with some reluctance.

He subsequently gave up his Montgomery pastorage, moved to Atlanta and established the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which now has more than 60 full-time workers and more than 100 affiliates across the nation. He is also co-pastor, with his father, of the Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta.

THE conference is hardly a model of organization and efficiency. Dr. King lays no claim to being an administrator. "No one ever quite knows what the S.C.L.C. and Dr. King are going to do next," a member of a rival civil rights organization said. "They are a bunch of preachers, all heart and no business acumen."

No one will dispute, however, that Dr. King is the leading spokesman for the American Negro and the most prominent of his race since Booker T. Washington. He holds this position chiefly because of his ability to articulate the longings of his people, stoically but eloquently.

One day recently he sat on the screened porch of a St. Augustine home, sipped iced orange juice and talked of the goals and directions of the summer civil rights campaign. His appearance has changed little in the last eight years. He is a little thicker, but there is no flabbiness to him. He is a short man. Yet his broad, sloping face and thick neck give him a sense of power. There is no hint of the extraordinary life he leads. One day he is in a police car, guarded by a fierce dog on his way to jail for trying to eat at a segregated restaurant. The next day he is at Yale University, accepting an honorary degree.

His life is repeatedly threatened, for he inspires hatred among segregationists like no other Negro leader. Yet he moves freely around town with no visible protection.

"St. Augustine will not be another Albany," he said, referring to that embattled South Georgia city where months of intensive demonstrations brought little gain for Negroes and left an embittered white population.

BUT while the white community here was saying it would never yield, it did yield —a little. Many of the businessmen in St. Augustine pledged themselves to comply with the civil rights bill once it became law, ending segregation in public accommodations; and a bi-racial committee was scheduled to begin functioning later in the summer to hear Negro grievances.

"Even if we do not get all we should, movements such as this tend more and more to give a Negro the sense of self-respect that he needs," Dr. King said. "It tends to generate courage in Negroes outside the movement.

"It brings intangible results outside the community where it is carried out. There is a hardening of attitudes in situations like this. But other cities see and say, 'We don't want to be another Albany or Birmingham,' and they make changes. Some communities, like this one, had to bear the cross."

CAMPAIGNING in Birmingham last year brought some desegregation in that city. But, more important in Dr. King's view, it touched off the Negro revolt of 1963 that caused President Kennedy to give civil rights top legislative priority. By offering himself to the white man's violence, the Negro brought into being the civil rights act of 1964.

If classical nonviolence does not work in its purest sense — that is bringing about reconciliation and equal dignity of the races—then the Negro must accept for the time being a lesser victory: acceptance out of the white man's self-interest.

But what of nonviolence in the future? Are Negroes ready to abandon it, as some have said, and go off on some other course which could be more disruptive to peace and order?

"I still feel," Dr. King said, "that Negroes by and large in the United States are willing to follow tactical nonviolence.

"By that, I mean they believe in it in a pragmatic sense, not as a way of life as I do. I think the Negro will continue to accept nonviolence if it can bring about concrete victories. I think this will be the test of the summer, so to speak."

ONE thing is certain. Dr. King will continue to press his demands from a religious and spiritual base. He is too deeply rooted there to flourish elsewhere. Because of this he can be expected to inject some measure of humility and open-mindedness into the struggle.

"We will make progress," he says, "if we freely admit that we have no magic . . . . If we accept the fact that 400 years of sinning cannot be canceled out in four minutes of atonement. "Neither can we allow the guilty to tailor their atonement in such a manner as to visit another four seconds of deliberate hurt upon the victim."

These words take on special meaning for Americans when they see young Negroes in the nation's oldest city march into the flaying fists of the mob singing joyously "We love everybody."

UNSAINTLY

First Christian settlement in Americas

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla., is a hot tempered, sun-drenched area of shocking contradictions. Founded in 1565 as the first permanent settlement in America, the small Atlantic port was the original spot where settlers came to escape the tyranny of the "Old World." As the historic city prepared to celebrate the 400th anniversary of its birthday, Negro residents still sought to escape the oppression of the "New World." Today, they are determined to make the city, named after black saint St. Augustine the Moor, a living symbol of justice and equality.

Situated along three palm-lined rivers off the Atlantic ocean, St. Augustine is bursting with seething passions over race relations. The city, which calls itself "the oldest white settlement" in America, has a Negro namesake because it was founded on St. Augustine's birthday. The former Spanish fortress takes pride in being the first Christian settlement in the Americas, but it still bars Negroes and Indians from most religious ceremonies. The first Christian community later became the center of a booming slave trade in Florida. Today, still entrenched in tradition, descendants of the early settlers are determined to deny their Negro fellow citizens equality.

Calling on President Johnson to boycott next year's segregated quadricentennial celebration, Dr. Robert Bangor Hayling, the Tennessee-born leader of the St. Augustine civil rights movement, vowed that Negro residents will use "every effort possible" to halt the festivities unless it is completely integrated or the civil rights bill becomes effective at once. A tall, handsome dentist with close cropped hair, 34-year-old Dr. Hayling helped start the St. Augustine campaign as local NAACP youth advisor, a position he resigned when officials blamed early clashes between civil rights demonstrators and segregationists "on militant Negroes and the Ku Klux Klan." Snapped the dentist: "Negroes are not supposed to defend themselves in this country like the founders. They'll be branded as radicals and extremists if they do . . ." Although officials indicated a willingness to discuss Negro demands for desegregation "without Dr. Hayling," long-time Negro residents backed the dentist's militant leadership without compromising their demands.

Stick-wielding whites beat on unarmed Negro bathers who had attempted to swim at St. Augustine ocean beach. After several members of both sides were injured, police officers armed with clubs, waded into surf and broke up melee. Other integration attempts included "kneel-in" at city's white Trinity Episcopal Church. Attempt was successful.

In his appeal on the eve of the July Fourth signing of the civil rights bill, Dr. Hayling declared that "an impasse still exists in St. Augustine . . . and no progress toward even a minimal settlement of our grievances is being made . . . Negro citizens, fearful of further arrests and physical attack, are now being forced to moderate even their right to peaceful protests." Although local merchants promised a local grand jury that they would obey the new civil rights measures if authorities forced Negroes to call off demonstrations, Dr. Haylings reminded optimists that even though President Johnson had promised to see that the Quadricentennial Commission would be integrated if Negroes refrained from picketing his appearance in the city last year, there still is no Negro on any official body or agency in the town.

Ironically, the one Negro white St. Augustinians would like to get rid of most has been paid by the state government to stay. In 1960, Dr. Hayling signed a five-year contract with Florida agreeing to practice dentistry in the "hardship area" for five years in return for a scholarship to Meharry Medical College in Nashville, Tenn. "They wanted me to go to Panama City, but that was worse than here," says the outspoken practitioner whose patient load once was 50 per cent white. "Some of them (the whites) still sneak in the back door. Some people don't want you to integrate here for their own good," he fumes.

After appealing to all major civil rights groups in the nation for aid in desegregating the town, Dr. Hayling succeeded in getting the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to enter the campaign. Negro residents agreed to adopt a non-violent philosophy. "We investigated the situation," explained SCLC President, Martin Luther King Jr.—"and found that Dr. Hayling was a good man who had lost nearly all he had trying to help his people. We felt that a man like Dr. Hayling and a town like St. Augustine deserved to be saved . . ." Even though scores of pickets and sit-inners were beaten, shot and jailed in the historic town last year during a tragic campaign that was all but ignored by the press, hundreds of residents put down their arms and followed Dr. King's call to non-violent marches through the town square and old slave market to dramatize their plight.

In the beginning, they were met with bricks and bottles, firecrackers and some gun-fire. Silently, the marchers circled the palm-lined beachfront unmindful of the threats to their lives. As the demonstrations continued, police and newsmen were often more jittery than the demonstrators. Finally, Gov. Ferris Bryant took personal command of the 500-man combined force of state police, sheriff's deputies and special state agents ordered to provide protection for the marchers by Federal Judge Bryan Simpson. One Florida Memorial College student, who repeatedly marched with the demonstrators after being released from jail, admitted: "Sure, we were all scared, but it was something we had to do." Another youth gave his reactions to non-violence: "I'd rather hit a man back if he does something to me," admitted Richard Eubanks, "but this non-violent stuff does make you feel good." Dr. King's and Dr. Hayling's marchers continued their non-violent tactics so effectively that Ku Klux Klan Grand Dragon J. B. Stoner of Atlanta finally urged klansmen not to engage in any violence against the demonstrators. "Let's show the niggers we can act just as good as they can," he declared. Nevertheless, interracial groups of swimmers continued to be bloodied and beaten as they attempted to use the legally integrated beachfront until state troopers waded into the water in full uniform to break up the one-sided assaults.

St. Augustine Negroes were often charged with assault even though they were the victims of violence. SCLC listed 60 instances of attacked victims being charged with resistance and 12 acts of economic reprisals involving loss of jobs and business. Last February, terrorists fired into Dr. Hayling's home while it was occupied by his wife and two children. "They killed my pet dog and would have hit my wife if she had not been talking on the phone," the dentist recalls bitterly. "No arrests were made for the shooting and no one was questioned.

In another incident, four Negro youths were injured by gunfire inside a home. When three of them reported the shooting, they were arrested for shooting back at the white boys who fired on them. Police only dropped the charges against the Negroes when they agreed to drop the charges against the white youths.

One of the most startling incidents occurred in America's oldest city when Dr. Hayling and three Negroes attempted to attend a Ku Klux Klan meeting in the area. The following eye witness report was filed by the Rev. Irwin Cheney of Daytona Beach, Fla., a white minister and assistant director of the Florida Council on Human Relations:

"It was a murky September evening . . . Handbills had been distributed throughout St. Augustine inviting 'all white people' to attend a rally of the Ku Klux Klan. I was asked to attend as an observer. . . . No sooner had I arrived at the clearing than a red-robed klansman ordered the lighting of the cross. The huge cross, possibly 20 feet high, had been wrapped in burlap, soaked in a flammable liquid, and placed in an upright position. A match was applied and the cross was immediately covered with flames. Robed klansmen and klanswomen, two dozen strong walked in a circle around the burning cross, giving a sort of sloppy left-handed sign of obeisance. It was vaguely reminiscent of the sieg-heil salute of the Nazis. . . .

"As this procession occurred, one could hear the faint strains of 'The Old Rugged Cross' floating across the crowd. A group of girls, early teen-agers, were humming and singing as the fire became more and more intense . . . The meeting was called to order (by) our brother Klansman Gene F. . . . without further preliminaries, the presiding officer said, 'Brothers and sisters, our speaker of the evening is a man who has been a minister of the gospel for more than 35 years. It is my pleasure to introduce you to Brother Connie Lee of Alabama.' No further biographical information was presented. . . . 'My friends,' Lee began, 'I want to share with you something of the history, the glorious history of the Klan. The Klan was born out of bloodshed, out of a real need to protect the Southern white man from the carpetbaggers—the Jew carpetbaggers. You know, of course, that the carpetbaggers was Jews, and they came down here and teamed up with the niggers and tried to take away everything the white man had. But they learned that the white man would not take this lying down. He organized. He organized into klans. He rose up to defend his honor and his interests. And I'll tell you that to this day, the Jews, the niggers and all the rest of the colored people are not afraid of anything else, but they are afraid of the Klan. . . .

'Not long ago, a man from the FBI—you know what that is, the Federal Bureau of Investigation—came by to talk with me. I'll guarantee you there's some of them in this crowd tonight, and some of them Jew bastards from the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith is here, too. They always spy on me. But anyhow, they came by and said, "Now you don't really advocate violence, do you?" And I said: "The hell you say. The niggers has declared all-out war on the plan of God and on God's family, the white man; and in war you shoot." Then, they said to me: "Do you know who bombed the church in Birmingham?" And I said, "No, and if I did, I wouldn't tell you. . . ."

'I believe in violence, all the violence it takes to either scare niggers out of the country or to have them all six feet under. My old daddy told me never to trust that old kicking mule we had, and never to trust a nigger. That was good advice . . .'

"The Rev. Connie Lee kept talking in this fashion for nearly two hours before the crowd of some 250 robed persons which kept drifting away until somebody shouted: Niggers! niggers! niggers! Frantically, Connie Lee jumped from the platform and jerked a gun from his coral-colored Cadillac, cocking it as he handed it to another man. Another gun appeared as if from out of the air and large knives, sticks and brass knuckles appeared on all sides. Twenty or more men went into the bushes to the north and in a few moments, they brought forth four Negro men to the platform. Each Negro was prodded by a knife or a gun in his back . . . There all sorts of taunts, vile, vicious, frantic. Boy, what, y'all doing out here? We just came out to run our fish lines, came the reply. Inasmuch as the spokesman (Dr. Hayling) wore a short-sleeved white shirt, a tie and neat slacks, the crowd screamed in disbelief. One of the Negroes was snatched around and ordered: Wipe that smile off your face! I marvelled at the Negroes' apparent composure throughout the ordeal . . .

"If the white men were reluctant to do harm, their women took care of that. They cajoled, shouted, and prodded the men into action. Children joined in the chorus of demands that the Negroes be killed. At this point, two white men stripped their shirts away and began to strike with their fists. At the sight of blood, I finally was jolted into an awareness of the fact this was, indeed, a tragically real occurrence. The beating continued with the women persisting: 'Castrate the bastards! Kick their b. . .s out! Knock their hands off! Kill 'em! Come on; do something! They had to trespass to get out here. They've got no right to live. String 'em up. . . .'

"Nearby, a robed woman spoke in a semi-whisper to her husband. 'Go get the head chopper . . . and get the rope. For God's sake, take off your robe and leave it in the car. You don't want to mess it up. It was then that I had to leave the crowd, make my way to a telephone and summon police help. . . ."

The Rev. Chaney succeeded in calling local police, the sheriff and the FBI and remained in the area long enough to see St. John's County Sheriff Lee David pick up Dr. Hayling and the three other Negroes from the mob as they were being beaten. The four Negroes were later arrested and charged with assault and trespassing for attending the klan meeting and "provoking a disturbance."

In moving into St. Augustine as the civil rights bill was being passed, Dr. King recognized he was putting America and the oldest city in the nation on the spot. "All eyes will be on St. Augustine next year and we must see that she lives up to her name," the great disciple of Gandhi's philosophy told his followers during one of the nightly pep meetings at St. Paul AME Church. By picking St. Augustine to stage the first major test of the civil rights bill, SCLC emphasized the startling difference between American ideals and practices. But Dr. King feels confident that America's oldest town will eventually help set the pattern of future race relations in the South.

Filled with new hope for eventual end of racial nightmare in their city, congregation listens as Dr. King pledges his organization's support. Within a few weeks after his arrival, city agreed to form bi-racial committee to end race conflict.

ELECTION DAY ACTION!!!!!

The SNCC Conference calls upon students all over the U. S. to move on Election Day, November 8, 1960. Three political points must be made: (1) We demand immediate action on civil rights from the victorious candidates. This action should embrace the recommendations of Section III of the 1957 Civil Rights Act. (2) We demand that the right to vote be assured and protected by the Federal Government, through appropriate legislation. (3) We demand that Rule 22 of the Senate be changed so that civil rights legislation will not be blocked by filibustering.

THE DEMONSTRATIONS SHOULD OCCUR ON THE AFTERNOON OF ELECTION DAY (4 P.M. your time) and should continue until the polls close. They should involve a march to the central polling place, State Capitols, Court Houses, and City Halls. Pre-demonstration meetings are urged - to analyze the situation and make plans for covering your area.

While recognizing the fact that the great strength of the movement will remain on the local level, we are convinced of the necessity of all areas joining in the campaign to secure civil rights. We hope that ALL students and many adults will recognize this and join, on NOVEMBER 8th, the march for freedom and human dignity for all Americans.

SNCC CONFERENCE

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee Conference on "Nonviolence and the Achievement of Desegregation" was held on the campuses of the Atlanta University Center, October 14-16, 1960. This was the second Southwide conference of students who are participating in the movement.

There to welcome some 300 persons from all over the nation were members of the Coordinating Committee and members of the host - the Atlanta Committee on the Appeal for Human Rights. Marion S. Barry, Jr. of Tennessee is chairman of SNCC; Lonnie C. King, Jr., chairman of the Atlanta group.

Highlighting the conference were discussions and speeches by great leaders in civil rights and human relations. Among these were Dr. Martin L. King, Jr., Ella J. Baker, James Lawson, Marion Wright of the Southern Regional Council, Lewis W. Jones of Tuskeegee, William Stuart Nelson of Howard, Richard B. Gregg, and author Lillian Smith of Georgia.

84 observers from all over the nation were in attendance; 40 of these were from nonsouthern colleges; 44 from organizations.

138 students came from 14 Southern states and the District of Columbia. This represented a total of 46 protest centers.

Southern schools present were: Alabama A & M, Stillman, Talladega, Tuskeegee, Arkansas A M & N, Philander Smith, Bethune-Cookman, Florida A & M, Stetson, Clark, Fort Valley State, ITC, Morehouse, Morris Brown, Spelman, Paine, Savannah State, Dillard, Loyola, McNeese, Maryland State, Morgan State, Univ. of Maryland, Tougaloo, N.C. A & T, Barber-Scotia, Duke, Johnson C. Smith, Livingstone, Shaw, Claflin, Friendship Junior, S. C. State, Morris, American Baptist Seminary, Fisk, Knoxville, Lane, Le Moyne, McHarry, Tenn. State, Bishop, Wiley, Univ. of Texas, Hampton, Va. Union, Va. State, Univ. of Va., Howard, and George Washington University.

ATLANTA -

This is the drama from October 19 until... 11 A.M. Wednesday-75 students, from 5 colleges in the Atlanta University Center, went into 8 downtown stores and "sat in". They were participating in an all-out protest instigated by the Atlanta Committee on the Appeal for Human Rights, formed last year.

11:30 - 6 were arrested at the entrance to the Magnolia Room of Richs Department Store, Atlanta's largest.

11:40 - 2 were arrested at the entrance to the Cockerel Grill, Richs basement.

1:15 - 3 students and Dr. King were arrested at the Magnolia Room entrance.

1:45 - 3 students were arrested at the Barbecue Grill, Richs sub-basement.

2:00 - 19 students were arrested at the entrance to the Magnolia Room.

2:30 - 13 students were arrested same place.

2:40 - 2 students were arrested at the Cockerel Grill entrance.

Many of these had left seats in Davisons, Woolworths, Kress, McCrorys, Grants, Newberrys, and H. L. Greens. There, all the counters had been closed within seconds and ropes put around the students. When word came of the arrest of Lonnie King, chairman and of Dr. Martin L. King, Jr., the students went to Riches...and were arrested. At 2:30 and 4:30, they were tried in city court. 36 were sent to Fulton Tower, on $500 bond, charged with the violation of the Ga. Anti-Trespass Law. 13 were released since the Magnolia Room had already been closed when they arrived.

10:30 A.M. Thursday-Hundreds of students entered 16 downtown stores. Counters were closed and 26 were arrested. 22 of these were charged with loafing and disturbance in the Terminal Station and were sent to the city prison farm for 10 days. 3, arrested for trespass in the Terminal Station lunch counter, were sent to Fulton Tower.

ACROSS THE EDITORS DESK

The sick South symbolizes the sick world. Men are full of fear because their world is trembling. They have no place to stand. This is why nonviolence has real healing potential. It says that the only "place to stand" is in relation. To what? To the self and the other. Nonviolence says that each person has personhood, that each of us is capable of entering into relation.

Consequently, nonviolence refuses to manipulate. It refuses to regard persons as things, as "its". If we lose sight of this basic concept of nonviolence, no matter how nonviolent our external tactics remain, we will lose the ultimate potential of the student movement. For, without this commitment to the validity of the other person, the movement will become an institution and the persons will become things.

But, we say, somebody is going to manipulate and to capitalize on the movement. Therefore, we seek to do it ourselves, being convinced that "we" are right. Let us all know that there is a great difference between active concern and the attempt to "make the movement what it ought to be". The danger of manipulation can be removed only when our active concern takes the form of concern for the individual person involved - the student and the segregationist. These people have names, and, though coming together they form great forces, they remain people. They, and we all, must so remain. To retain personhood will be the hardest battle of all...in a world where a mass movement is necessary to save the South and America. But the South and America will not be worth saving unless there are persons, real selves, left to live there. This retaining and creating of personhood is the great and final goal of the student movement. It will be reached IF the students and IF all persons involved truly understand and follow the concept of nonviolence.

The most immediate threat to personhood is organization. This is essential to the movement now. But organizations are totally vulnerable to institutionalization and to "thingness". The movement is more than a social force, a nameless entity. It is people sitting, people standing, people waiting, people giving, people hoping. It can be a vision of the self into the self and an acceptance of the other.

We quote from Martin Buber's I and Thou: "This is part of the basic truth of the human world, that only IT can be arranged in order. Only when things, from being THOU, become IT, can they be coordinated. The THOU knows no system of coordination...THOU establishes relation". Let us watch that we do not miss the real potential of the student movement, or shall we say, the students moving...in commitment to nonviolence. The longing of the South, the North, the students, the world is a place to stand. Nonviolence says...stand in relation.

10:30 A.M. Friday-Students continued the picket lines around these stores. 2 were arrested at the Lane Drug Co. and were sent to Fulton Tower.

Same Night - 41 persons were in the Tower, refusing bail, and 22 were on the prison farm.

Saturday - Students were off the streets. The Ku Klux Klan picketed instead. The mayor had had the 22 under city charges released. Richs had dropped charges and the Fulton Tower prisoners were out. The students had agreed to a 30-day truce during which time Mayor Hartsfield will negotiate with store managers in the attempt to arrive at an "ultimate solution".

THE THIRTY DAY TRUCE IS ON! You are urged to write letters of support to Mr. Lonnie C. King, Jr., chairman of the Atlanta student committee, 197½ Auburn Ave., N. E., Atlanta 3. You are asked to write to Mayor William Hartsfield pressing him to fulfill his terms of the truce as the students are doing.

ORANGEBURG -

October 20 - another drama was taking place to the north of Atlanta when Chuck McDew, student at South Carolina State, and member of the Coordinating Committee, led five other students into Kress of Orangeburg. They refused to leave...and were arrested for trespassing and jailed under $100 bond.

Minutes later, at the Orangeburg City Jail, over 100 students marched in protest of the action by the city, and in support of the students. Orangeburg resorted to its usual method and brought out the fire hose to break up the students who were singing in front of the jail.

It looked like a recurrence of Black Friday in Orangeburg when, on March 15, last Spring, 318 were protesting and 249 arrested.

October 24 - the 6 students were released. They wait again to be tried. You are asked to write, supporting S. C. State and Claflin students: c/o Mr. Charles McDew, S. C. State College, Orangeburg, South Carolina.

---

 Students outside the South and in areas where lunchcounters have been desegregated are asked to picket the following stores under a MAKE TRUE THE TRUCE . . . FREE THE SOUTH! campaign: Woolworths, Kress, McCrory, Grant, H. L. Green, Newberrys, Lane Rexall Drug Company, and Walgreen Drug Company.

This sympathy campaign will apply specifically to Orangeburg and Atlanta but will be a continuation of the sympathy demonstrations against a segregated society.

DR KING IS IN - DEKALB COUNTY JAIL

PARKER STILL JAILED

Richard Parker, student at Florida State University, sits in the Duval County Jail, Jacksonville, Fla. with a broken jaw and without 25 lbs. lost because he could not eat solid food. He is serving a 90 day sentence, charged with inciting the Jacksonville riot of Aug. 27. Parker was the only white student to join the Aug. 25-26 sit-ins in Jacksonville, but was arrested while sitting alone, 3 days later, in a white restaurant! Write to Parker and to his Dean, Dr. R. R. Oglesby, Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

"SOUTHERN MINISTERS PILGRIMAGE"

There are persons in the Southern Church who are deeply concerned about the racial situation in America. On October 25, a large group of Southern students from the seminaries, both North and South, joined Southern ministers in a pilgrimage to Atlanta. Their purpose was prayer and witness - to the evil of segregation and to the integrity of all persons.

The ministers remained in Atlanta for two days in their stand against injustice. They were present for the DeKalb County trial of Dr. Martin L. King, Jr.

SPECIAL CONTRIBUTIONS: SNCC thanks Brewster Kneen and Jim Laue for these contributions and for their deep and continuing concern. Kneen, a senior at Union Theological Seminary in N. Y., has worked for some time with the Fellowship of Reconciliation and recently led one of the workshops in nonviolence at the SNCC conference. Laue, graduate sociologist at Harvard, spent the summer in the South, working with students and with SNCC, getting in and out of jail and recently, helping with the October conference.

"NONVIOLENCE AND VISION"

Brewster Kneen

The sit-in movement has developed from a single assertion of man's integrity and love by God to a sweeping drive to end the political, social, and economic exploitation of one class by another. The movement has begun a crusade which few dreamed possible-and yet, it may, at any time, fail and be only a spark of hope extinguished.

The threats to it are essentially two. The most obvious is that under aggrevation, violence will come, wiping out the moral force of the movement and discrediting all the real reconciliation it has so far achieved. The second threat to the movement is short-sightedness, not seeking to reach and maintain an integrity basic to the Christian life and the Way of Love. It is this threat which I wish to emphasize here.

If the sit-in movement, with its hall mark of nonviolence, is to be true to itself, it must not limit itself to reaching selfish end, i.e., improvement of the economic and social conditions of a particular class. It is not wrong to seek a resolution to the very severe injustice of segregation but when men take up the way of reconciliation, there are no longer limits to their self-identification; there are no longer simply exploited Negroes, but members of the family of man. Thus, they must seek to improve not only their own status, but they must also seek to resolve those conflicts which separate men from men through out the world.

Love itself implies concern and responsibility for those loved, and when love takes action, this action must be such that it respects the integrity of the other and accepts its responsibility for the welfare and selfhood of the other. But such love knows no bounds, no class, no nation. Its concern is with the communication of men with men under every condition. Its expression is the resolution of those conflicts which divide men. Thus, the segregated Negro in the South bears a responsibility for his exploited Puerto Rican brother in the North. So, too, he bears a responsibility not just to man around the world but to future generations, and thus he must insist on and work for an end to nuclear arms and testing. He must see also that his larger class, the United State, has no

SOCIOLOGY, SIN, AND SNAILS?

James Laue

Few who read this column will need convincing that the lunchcounter protest movement has had an unfathomable impact on American life. The evidence is everywhere.

At latest count, the number of cities where counters have been desegregated since F Day (Freedom Day, Feb. 1, 1960) was a passing 112. 11 states have been affected; counters will open in some of the 5 deep South holdouts before the first anniversary of F Day, I predict. Thousands of northern students and adults have joined in aympathy -and have moved into the fight against discrimination problems in housing and in employment which still smudge the Yankee conscience. These overt evidences need no further elaboration.

From a socio-anthropological point of view, there is no better indicator of the saliance of a cultural event or complex than its expression in the language. That the suffix "in" could have become the by word for nonviolent direct action against segregation in only a few months seems almost unbelievable to the sociologist who is used to snail-like change in linguistic patterns. That the American public is now immediately able to understand such coinages as "wade in" and "kneel in" is perhaps the best indication of the de facto status of the nonviolent civil rights protest in our culture today.

Since my return to Cambridge and the cloistered life of a graduate student, after a summer of research and participation in the protest movement, I have been asked by many persons, "Where will the movement go next?" My answer invariably is "kneel ins". This reply has grown from observation as a sociologist and involvement as a human. The lunchcounter sit-ins have appealed to the individual conscience with such success. It is "time"...both sociologically and morally...to start tickling the guilt on the collective conscience. The church as institution appointed to guard America's social soul, holds an overflowing reservoir of guilt about racial and ethnic injustice, a reservoir long ready for draining.

The widespread nature of the press attention to the Atlanta kneel-ins of August 7, conducted by SNCC and Atlanta students, is a good gauge of just how heavily this issue rests on the American mind. While no right to exploit the populations of other nations through support of such fascist dictatorships as Spain and Formosa. This may mean the end of a concept of "defense" through violence - a concept which is totally contradictory to the way of nonviolence and reconciliation taken up by the American Negro. It is essential if man is to live with man and not against him.

Having shown their love and responsibility for the antagonist, the participants in the sit-in movement are called to extend their vision and to see the responsibility they bear for all exploited and all exploiters. Will the movement fail as one more expression of one class asserting its rights against another. . . or will the Negro and his white sympathizer accept this challenge for vision?

the ultimate purpose of such action is the temporal unification of the Christian community, the immediate effect is the calling to American Christians to take a stand on this moral dilemna. The Christian Century of August 24 calls Christians to this stand ". . .The will of Christ for the races will not be accomplished until Negro Christians and white Christians break bread together on their knees".

A final observation: as a white American (not a "Northern white"), I feel the most important attitude for persons on every side of the geographical, racial, and religious coin is that this is not a movement of any particular group of people against any other group. It is not "black against white"; it is justice against injustice. We must strive to abhor and fight the evil principle, but not its bearer.

---

AND SMILES... A wonderful by-product of the movement has been the constant good humor maintained by students in the face of threatening situations. They tell these:

The waitress told a pair of sit-inners, "I'm sorry, but we don't serve Negroes here. "Oh, we don't eat them either," came back the reply. "We just want a cup of coffee."

Or how about the flustered counter clerk who, when approached by an integrated group in Miami, blurted out, "I'm sorry, we don't serve. . .er. . . ah. . .people here."

REPORT FROM THE OFFICE OF SNCC

The following is an outline condensation of the SNCC office report, given at the October Conference by Edward B. King, Jr., administrative secretary of the Committee. After a presentation of the background of the Committee, Mr. King outlined the areas in which SNCC has functioned during the summer.

I. The Committee and Relief: We have supported all activities carried out on the local level throughout the South, endeavoring to supply service to these areas.
   - A. By contact with expelled students-SNCC worked with the students and with the National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students.
   - B. By contact with students involved in litigation-SNCC worked with the students and with the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP.
   - C. By contact with students active in protests.

II. The Committee and Involvement: Again, supporting activities on the local level, SNCC sought to strengthen the local protest and, thus, the Southwide movement.
   - A. By encouraging non-protest areas to begin action.
   - B. By supporting the action of nonsouthern students.
   - C. By seeking to involve Southern white students.

III. The Committee and Long-Range Coordination: Coordination is the basis of all areas in which we have worked. We aimed at organization that would be lasting.
   - A. Working for the organization of state coordinating committees.
   - B. Working for national coordination on particular projects.
   - C. Working for permanent civil rights legislation by speaking before the Platform Committees of both major political parties, by letters to Congress, and by demonstrations in Washington.

IV. The Committee and Primary Problems.
   - A. Lack of cooperation from a few highly autonomous local groups.
   - B. Lack of communication across the South, due to the fact that many students involved last Spring had graduated and moved out of the South.
   - C. The threat of compromise: groups desiring to capitalize on the movement, or to control it subtly, have caused us to face the danger of forgetting the real goals of the movement. These goals cannot be bought and sold. To compromise the means is to forsake the end. Mr King warned of this ever-present danger of forgetting the real meaning of nonviolence and the ultimate goals of the student movement - the freedom of persons to be persons.

ALBATROSS

This summer, Blake Smith, student at Swathmore, conceived of "an intercollegiate magazine of letters written by students to men of influence, which will transform every letter published into a powerful social lever". ALBATROSS is such a magazine and is now a going thing! It is published by Swathmore students, but reflects the ideas and desires of all America.

"...because our minds are knit into a web, the agitation of a few will tremble in all dimensions. Students cannot control they can only communicate, in a Tokyo snake dance, a Nashville sit-in, or a chorus behind their printed word". (Sept. Press Summary of ALBATROSS)

SEND CARBONS OF YOUR PRESSURE LETTERS TO ALBATROSS, Swathmore College, Swathmore Pa. Subscription rates are $2 for students and $5 for patrons, for six issues. REMEMBER THE ALBATROSS! SEND OLE CARBONS!

MWCC

A Midwestern Student Coordinating Committee was formed at the October 8 Seminar on Human Relations held at Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio. The seminar was attended by students from 24 midwestern colleges and universities. Three members from each participating school will serve on the Coordinating Committee.

According to the newsletter of the MWCC, the purpose is "to coordinate all civil rights direct action in the area and to be the center for the collection and dispersal of information about the midwestern area as well as information about Southern schools and SNCC".

Midwestern colleges not yet members of the Coordinating Committee should contact: KATHLEEN COULBOURNE, NOBLE COTTAGE, OBERLIN COLLEGE, OBERLIN, OHIO. Action reports and requests for the newsletter, "The Activist" should be sent to that address also.

"UNFINISHED REVOLUTION"

SNCC strongly recommends this brilliant, most complete account of the social revolution that is transforming America. UNFINISHED REVOLUTION, by Tom Kahn, is the outstanding analysis of the movement, its background and implications.

Order from Igor Rogdenko, printer, 36 East Tenth Street, New York 3, N. Y. 50¢ per copy; 35¢ when ordering 100 or more.

MUSIC OF THE MOVEMENT

Guy Carawan, artist of folk music, introduced "We Shall Overcome" to the students. This great ballad has become the theme song and Guy, the music man.

Recently released by Folkways is the LP "The Nashville Sit-In Story", conceived and directed by Guy with the Nashville students and ministers. These are the sounds that sweep the South today.

Order: Folkways Records, Album No. FH 5590, 117 West 46th St., New York, N. Y.

WEST COAST NEWS

People on the West coast are doing a great job. There are active groups both on the campuses and in communities. One guy particularly is really working for the coordination out there and for SNCC. TOM ROSE is a voluntary coordinator! He is selling buttons like crazy...and needs help from "sales groups".

The black and white buttons read: "SUPPORT SOUTHERN STUDENTS" and around the edge is "STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE".

Persons in the West should contact Tom about projects and all persons interested in buying the buttons, or in handling sales in their areas should write immediately: TOM ROSE, 1438 McAllister St., San Francisco, California.

Plus being a $ource of income for the movement, such buttons give one identity (!) which one does need...

P L E A S E  W R I T E ! !

ATLANTA, GA: Mayor Wm. Hartsfield, City Hall, supporting his efforts in negotiation.

ORANGEBURG, S.C.: Mayor Fair urging desegregation of lunchcounters there; also to S. H. Kress Co. where the 6 were arrested.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.: Richard Parker, white student still in jail for "inciting the Jacksonville riot" of August 27; also to Dean R. R. Oglesby of Fla. State Univ. urging him to act to see that Parker gets food while jailed.

SNCC DOES NOT ASK THAT YOU WRITE FOR THE RELEASE OF JAILED STUDENTS, but that you urge stores and city officials to desegregate. We do support Jail versus Bail.

THE STUDENT VOICE: CORRECT ADDRESS FORM

The publication and mailing of "The Student Voice" costs us nearly $100 each month. Consequently, we need two things: we need a correct mailing list and we need and welcome contributions to SV. We ask that you clip this form and return it with your correct mailing address printed here. Thank you very much.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE -- More than 200 students from North and South gathered here Thanksgiving at the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's leadership training institute.

They held workshops on aspects of the student movement, discussed some action plans for the future, and demonstrated at 12 of Nashville's segregated restaurants.

The three-day meeting, November 23-25, featured a direct action attack in Nashville's downtown area, coordinated by the institute's host, the Nashville Student Nonviolent Movement.

SNCC's Coordinating Committee also adopted a proposal to begin work on a

SNCC Confab Launches 'Free Kennard' Drive

At its Nashville meeting, SNCC resolved to open a campaign to free Clyde Kennard, a 30-year old Mississippi Negro who tried to enter Mississippi Southern College four years ago and is now serving a 7-year sentence in Parchman State Penitentiary for allegedly stealing five sacks of chicken feed.

Kennard, a native of Hattisburg, Miss., and a chicken farmer, applied for admission at Mississippi Southern in 1958. Writing in a letter the THE AMERICAN newspaper on January 23, 1960, he tried to "follow a reasonable course in the matter... The thought of presenting this request before a Federal Court for consideration, with all the publicity and misrepresentation that would bring about, makes my heart heavy." He concluded, say-

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS -- After a two-year period of inactivity here, sit-in demonstrations resumed November 8 at Woolworth's lunch counters and resulted in the arrests on November 28 of a SNCC executive committee member and a SNCC field secretary at Walgreen's.

Worth Long, 26, a SNCC executive committee member and a student at Philander Smith College, and William Hansen, 23, SNCC field secretary, were arrested at Walgreen's "for refusing to leave a business establishment after being requested to do so by the owner or manager."

Surplus Food Denied to Registrants

RULEVILLE, MISSISSIPPI -- Charles Cobb and Charles McLaurin, SNCC field secretaries working on the Mississippi voter registration drive, report that a new economic squeeze is being put on Negro citizens here, where two shootings occurred last summer.

Sharecroppers and day laborers are finding it very difficult to obtain surplus government commodities, the two SNCC workers say.

"Commodities (surplus food) are the only way many Negroes make it from cotton season to cotton season," their report states. "If this is taken away from them, they have nothing at all. The success of our voter registration program depends on the protection we can offer the individual while he is waiting for his one small vote mean something. It doesn't take much to tide ever the rural Mississippi Negro, but the commodities are vital."

Sharecroppers average $300-400 each year, Cobb and McLaurin state. Day laborers receive $150-160 yearly.

Many sharecroppers now have to fill our new registration papers showing how much they earned from each employer, many of whom keep no records. These forms must be signed by the applicant and countersigned by his employer or a responsible person. Cobb and McLaurin point out that this usually means a white person. "Due to the voter registration drive...in Ruleville, the 'responsible people' are not particularly inclined to favors for the Negro."

Last summer, after the voter drive was initiated, nightriders shot into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Sisson, both of whom were active in the drive. Shots injured two young girls, Jackson State students, who were sitting in the Sissons' living room.

"First Amendment is Dead"

Albany Leaders, NAG Protest in Washington

ALBANY, GEORGIA -- After a series of arrests during a drive for economic withdrawal, Albany Movement leaders obtained an appointment Dec. 10 with Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall in Washington, D. C. to discuss "the death of the First Amendment in Albany." Two carloads of picketers arrested on Dec. 6 drove to Washington and picketed with the nonviolent Action Group (NAG) in the capitol on Dec. 10.

Jack Chatfield, a SNCC field secretary working on the Southwest Georgia Voting project was arrested on November 12 after talking with demonstrators wearing t-shirts with the words "Don't Buy Downtown or Midtown."

He was charged with "accosting young Negro girls" and refusing to give information when approached by "the arresting officer."

Chatfield was held six days in the city jail and then released on bond. At his trial November 21, Chatfield was sentenced to a 60-day term (which will be appealed) and then spent 2 additional days in jail.

On December 6 seven pickets urged economic withdrawal unless fair employment practices were instituted.

Institute

"Free Clyde Kennard" drive. (See story, page 1).

On Saturday, November 24, 150 of the institute's participants staged sit-ins at 12 Nashville restaurants. Bobby Talbert, a student who was expelled from a McComb, Miss. high school for his participation in an anti-segregation demonstration in August, 1961, was arrested on November 24 with a white bystander and the manager of Wilson Quick Drugstore. The bystander had beaten Talbert on the head and the manager had sprayed demonstrating students with a fire extinguisher.

Talbert charged that Nashville police also beat him while he was in the Davison County jail. He was released on November 26 when the charges against him were dropped.

Other demonstrators were pushed and slapped. One was punched in the groin by an irate employee of a restaurant.

Students were refused in all restaurants tested. After the demonstrations ended, all 150 marched to the First Baptist Church through the streets of downtown Nashville singing "We Shall Overcome." Later the group marched silently to the Davidson County jail where they sang and prayed on the street to Talbert, imprisoned inside.

Slater King, executive vice president of the Albany Movement, delivered the keynote address on Friday evening, November 23. King, who provided office space for SNCC field secretaries when they first came to Albany in October, 1961, urged students to continue their struggle for freedom.

Charles McDew, chairman of SNCC, addressed the students the next evening and urged them not to forget "the Mack Parkers, the Emmett Tills."

Workshops at the institute included discussions on nonviolence, the economy of the South, politics and voter registration, civil liberties and communications.

Pete Seeger Tours South For SNCC

Pete Seeger, internationally known folk singer, recently completed a tour of concerts for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in several Southern cities and college communities.

Seeger, 43, a founder of the Weavers and writer of "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?", co-writer of "If I Had a Hammer," and other songs, traveled through Georgia, Alabama, Texas and North Carolina for SNCC.

He sang in Atlanta, and twice in Albany, Ga.; in Birmingham and Tuskegee, Ala., in Chapel Hill, N. C., and three times in Austin, Texas.

In Atlanta he introduced the Freedom Singers to the Atlanta community, and entertained an audience of 800 with his freedom songs from all over the world.

After the Atlanta concert, November 11, he spent four hours with the Freedom Singers recording many of their songs on portable equipment he had brought from New York.

Seeger sang to audience of 1400 students at the University of Texas, and to 1000 students at the University of North Carolina.

"This incident," said SNCC executive secretary James Forman in Atlanta, "shows that the Woolworth chain in the South is not completely integrated. We urge all friends of democracy to protest these arrests by sending telegrams to the Woolworth board of directors demanding that all lunch counters in every Southern Woolworth store serve everyone, regardless of race."

Holloway was released Dec. 7, the other prisoners on Dec. 4.

Gadsden has no integrated public facilities, though a suit against city-owned facilities is pending.

Field Sec'y In Oxford Reports Courage, Hatred

OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI -- Robert Zellner, SNCC field secretary, reports from the University of Mississippi that although a heavy atmosphere of hatred and tension still exists on this campus since the entry of James Meredith, a small group of students and professors "have braved physical and social intimidation" to make Meredith welcome.

Zellner, 23, a native of Alabama and graduate of Huntingdon College in Montgomery, Ala., said: "I believe this is the beginning of something truly wonderful in the white society of Mississippi."

He pointed out that some weeks ago, two freshmen, both from rural Mississippi, attended a concert when Meredith walked in. They invited him to sit with them, and the three chatted amiably. Some days later, a cherry bomb exploded in one of the boy's rooms, and he found a large sign with the words "nigger lover" on the door.

Zellner said that hate sheets entitled "Rebel Underground" and "Rebel Resistance" are put under students' doors at night urging them to boycott Meredith "for the NAACP leper he is."

However, Zellner pointed out that this small group of liberal students and professors were acting with great courage. Some students, he said, stayed on campus during the riot trying to dissuade students from violence and urging them to return to their dormitories.

Other students, all native Southerners, invited Meredith to dinner in mid-November, and returned to their dormitory to find their rooms completely ransacked, in shambles.

Zellner commented, "As a recent student in a Southern institution and as a victim of the trauma that befalls a Southerner when he goes against his fascist-like background, my heart is with these brave young students."

Laurel, Miss. Negro Runs For JP Post

LAUREL, MISSISSIPPI - A Negro candidate for Jones County Beat 1 Justice of the Peace, Clinton, C. Collins, finished fifth in a field for six in the November primary.

Local leaders said that Collins' race "has done more than anything to awaken Negroes to their civic responsibility."

Collins received a majority in two heavily Negro precincts. SNCC workers have been heading up a voter registration drive here.

SNCC HQ at Raymond St.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- After residence in what TIME Magazine called a "windowless cubicle" on Auburn Avenue, and then a brief home further up the street in a large loft, the offices of SNCC have moved to 6 Raymond Street, N.W. (see left).

For the first time since its inception in April, 1960, SNCC has a permanent home with enough room to accomodate staff and volunteers gleaned from the nearby Atlanta University system.

SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman said, "We are still in need, however, of office supplies, particularly pens, pencils, typewriters, paper, and other office equipment."

The sign on SNCC's door, beneath the symbol of white and Negro hand clasped in friendship, reads "Freedom House."

Kennard

ing, "Yet what other course can I take?"

The course Kennard took to enter an all-white college in Mississippi finally ended for him in Parchman.

After he had applied the second time in 1959, he was arrested for reckless driving. At the police station, police confronted him with five pints of whiskey, which they claimed to have found in his car. He was found guilty and fined $600 and costs.

Kennard then found it increasingly difficult to buy feed for his poultry. His credit was cut off and an unofficial boycott went into effect.

On September 25, 1960, five sacks of chicken feed (valued at $5 each) were stolen from the Forrest County Cooperative Warehouse. A Johnny Lee Roberts, 19, confessed to the theft, but claimed that Kennard had instigated the robbery.

Roberts was placed on five years probation and is free. Kennard, on the other hand, was convicted of being an accessory to the crime and was sentenced to seven years. He has been imprisoned for two years.

Delegates at the SNCC leadership training institute were urged to send telegrams and petitions to the President, their local congressmen and senators.

Charles McDew, SNCC chairman, said, "We urge all freedom-loving Americans to participate in this campaign to free Clyde Kennard." He suggested that letters be sent registered to Kennard in order to insure their delivery.

Long and Hansen had tried to take seats at a roped off counter when they were arrested. A sign reading "This fountain is closed in the interest of public safety" was put up on the counter.

They were both released on November 30 on $500 bond each.

After the two were arrested, students from Philander Smith, most of whom are members of the Student Freedom Movement, marched in downtown Little Rock to protest the arrests.

The current series of demonstrations began on November 8 at Woolworth's. Though students sat-in there several times, no arrests occured. Counters were closed immediately after students appeared.

Amos Guthridge, head of the Little Rock White Citizens Council, came into Woolworth's several times and threatened the students. One student said Guthridge sprayed some liquid on them as they sat at the closed, darkened counter.

Despite the arrests at Walgreens, negotiations are being conducted with Woolworth's to see if the lunch counters can be opened to serve all customers, regardless of race, in the near future.

The Mississippi Story

SNCC Staff Jailed as Greenwood Negroes Register in "First Breakthrough" in Miss.

GREENWOOD, MISS.- Eleven voter registration workers from SNCC - including Executive Secretary, James Forman - were arrested here and charged with "inciting to roit" and "refusing to move on" after Greenwood police turned a dog loose in a group of 150 Negroes on their way to register to vote at the LeFlore County Courthouse.

Nine of the SNCC workers were sentences to four months in jail plus a $200.00 fine. They have all agreed to serve their sentences, rather than appeal "illegal charges for crimes we have not committed."

Forman said from the jail that "the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee workers in LeFlore County are determined to stay until every eligible Negro is registered to vote!"

In jail are: Lafayette Surney, Lawrence Guyot, Curtis Hayes, James Forman Robert Moses, Willie Peacock, Bobby Talbert, James Jones, Charles McLauren and Frank Smith.

In Atlanta, the SNCC office protested the arrests and "intimidation of prospective Negro voters" to the United State Department of Justice, the Civil Rights Commission the Federal Bureau of Investigation and with several U. S. Congressmen.

SNCC worker Don Harris who has been working in Southwest Georgia but who answered Forman's call for additional workers, was also jailed.

The 18-month old SNCC program in the state has provoked shootings, beatings, burnings and daily harassment of SNCC staff by whites, who grasp the challenge of Negro voter registration.

James Travis, a 20-year old SNCC field secretary was shot by three whites in an untagged car on February 28. A bullet grazed his shoulder, and another hit Travis in the back of the neck, where it became lodged behind his spine.

Travis, a native Mississippians and former Freedom Rider, is recovering rapidly.

Robert Moses, director of the SNCC drive, and Randolph Blackwell, field director of the Atlanta-based Voter Education Project, were also in the car but not injured. Moses said, "We were all inches away from being killed."

But there have been other shootings. On March 6, Samuel Block and Willie Peacock, two SNCC field secretaries, and two young women from Greenwood, Essie Broome and Peggy Marye, were shot at by white assailants in another untagged car. Windows were smashed, but the four were not injured.

Moses explained the sudden rash of attempted murders when he described the increased voter registration efforts in Greenwood as "the first real breakthrough in Mississippi." Just two days prior to Travis' shooting, at least 150 Negroes had attempted to register in Greenwood within two days, and are continuing to try to register at the rate of 20 a day.

Special wrath has been directed against Samuel Block, who is in charge of the Greenwood office, distributing food and clothing to the 20,000 Negroes cut off welfare and surplus government food rolls, (Leflore County officials announced the resumption of the county food program on March 20. However, SNCC field staff said that even when the program was operating, it was inadequate to take care of Negroes who need help.)

THIS IS THE CAR where death almost triumphed. Jimmy Travis, Robert Moses, and Randolph Blackwell sat in the front seat as bullets were pumped into the car. Travis, the driver, received a shoulder wound; a bullet penetrated the back of his neck and lodged behind his spine. Doctors said Travis would have died instantly if the bullet had entered his body with a little more force.

JAMES TRAVIS

(The Greenwood SNCC office was set on fire March 25; most of the registration figures and records were saved, but all office equipment completely destroyed.)

Last August, Block and three other field secretaries had to jump from a second-story window when a white mob, armed with guns, ropes and pipes, surrounded the building which housed their office.

On February 20, four Negro businesses were burned to the ground in Greenwood, just one block away from the SNCC office. Block stated publicly that he thought arsonists had meant to destroy it. Three days later Block was arrested on a charge of "circulating breach of the peace," which was later changed to "making statements calculated to breach the peace."

What differentiated this from the usual harassment against SNCC staff members was the reaction of Greenwood Negroes, who conquered generations of fear to protest. At Block's trial, on February 25, Negroes pack-

S. W. Georgia Voter Program Continues Despite Legal Losses

LEE, TERRELL AND SUMTER COUNTIES, GEORGIA -- Twelve Negro and white field secretaries, under the direction of Charles Sherrod, leader of SNCC's Southwest Georgia voter registration program, are continuing to register voters here despite harassment and loss of a suit against a county official who chased them at gunpoint.

John Churchville and Don Harris, two workers in Sumter county, were detained for an hour by Sumter County law enforcement officials, fingerprinted, and threatened with arrests for "vagrancy" March 18. The two said that "over 80" Negroes had made registration attempts in the county in the previous three week period.

In August, 1962, D. E. Short, a deputy town marshall in Sasser, shot at and chased three SNCC workers out of Terrell County. A Justice Department suit was filed against Short, who was accused of violating the workers' civil rights. Short was acquitted of the charge in 33 minutes by a 12-man, all-white jury on Janurary 25.

Sherrod and other workers cabled the President after Short's acquittal, saying that if the Justice Department did not protect voter registration workers in the Southwest Georgia counties, "our blood will be on your hands." They also protested the behavior of Justice Department lawyers, who asked them to say "colored folk" instead of "Negroes," sit segregated, and would not allow one young Negro woman field secretary, Prathia Hall, to wear a hat in the courtroom.

Despite the legal setback and the intimidation, the group continues to hold voter registration meetings in each county, and are taking groups down to register each week. Some field secretaries use a red-white-and-blue bus to carry them throughout the Negro communities, where they distribute voter registration material to citizens.

DEMONSTRATORS BEING HERDED into police van after a sit-in at Cross Keys Restaurant in downtown Nashville March 5. On left, John Lewis, chairman of the Nashville Nonviolent Movement. All 16 sit-inners, including a 61-year old minister, were charged with disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and conspiracy to obstruct trade and commerce. Lewis had led demonstrations at the same restaurant during the SNCC Fall Leadership Training Institute in Nashville. Prior to the arrests, students had staged sit-ins and protest marches at the downtown (segregated) branch of the YMCA.

Freedom in the air says Harper's "Rich with Immediacy,"

The April issue of Harper's Magazine says of FREEDOM IN THE AIR, a SNCC - produced documentary on Albany, Georgia, "...the sound of protest can be heard alive and quick..."

The review says, "It (FREEDOM IN THE AIR) is a 'documentary,' which means there are repetitions, and voices are mixed in with the music, but its materials are rich with immediacy and danger. It is called FREEDOM IN THE AIR and you can get it by sending a minimum contribution of four dollars to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, 6 Raymond Street, N.W., Atlanta 14, Georgia. The standards set by reality are sometimes higher than we are entitled to."

FREEDOM IN THE AIR has received excellent notices from the San Francisco Chronicle, which called it "an inspiring album." The Reporter Magazine said, "powerful and exhilarating," and the New York Times, in a review by Robert Shelton, said, "the most effective documentary recording to grow out of the integration movement..."

James Forman, SNCC executive secretary, said, "FREEDOM IN THE AIR is not only a record -- it is the means by which we are able to raise funds independently to support our 50 part-and full-time staff members."

Forman commented, "In addition to raising funds to support our staff, we consider the record an excellent way of people from other areas to hear for themselves, in on-the-spot recordings, what the excitement and dignity of the Albany Movement sounded like."

SNCC field secretaries came to Albany, Georgia in October, 1961, to set up a voter registration program, and were instrumental in forming the Albany Movement.

ATLANTA'S MAYOR IVAN ALLEN (center) meets with some 400 students from the Atlanta University complex who staged a protest march from the campuses to the steps of City Hall March 14. Two students had been arrested the day before at the Henry Grady Hotel after refusing to move when they could not obtain rooms. The students opened suitcases, removed pillows and blankets, and went to sleep in the lobby.

Mayor Allen lauded the tradition of progress in Atlanta, and said he was glad to hear the desires of the students.

Picketing resumed on March 15 in front of the Henry Grady, which is on property owned by the State of Georgia.

Students said, in a letter presented to Mayor Allen, they would "use every legal and nonviolent method" at their disposal to achieve integration in the city of Atlanta, and said more demonstrations were be forthcoming.

NEWS IN BRIEF

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS -- Clyde Kennard, subject of a SNCC petition drive, is in Billings Hospital here after cancer surgery. Kennard was released from Parchman Penitentiary at the request of Chicago medical authorities who said they had doubts for his life if he remained in prison.

Students at Tougaloo Southern Christian College in Jackson, who had first spearheaded the petition campaign, had collected names from every state in the union. The SNCC drive netted several thousand names.

**********

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA -- SNCC field secretary Robert Zellne's trial on "false pretenses" ended here February 28 with a hung jury. Judge Eugene Carter declared a mistrial. State attorneys have notified Zellner they will retry the case in late May, when the Montgomery Grand Jury will be in session.

Zellner has sued in Federal Court to restrain the prosecution and end harassment of himself and his family. Five state investigators followed him from Montgomery to Mobile where his grandmother lay dying and harassed his family through the wake and funeral.

Zellner's Federal petition charges that George C. Wallace, now Governor of Alabama, instigated his arrest on January 8 for vagrancy one week before he took office, against the instructions of then-Governor John Patterson.

**********

KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE -- Students for Equal Treatment, a student protest group at the University of Tennessee, was enjoined in late February from picketing a cafeteria here in groups of more than two because of the danger of passerbys receiving possible "bodily harm." Marion Barry, Jr., former SNCC Chairman and now head of SET, said, "We are in no way guilty of the charges in the injunction. In my opinion Judge Dawson was in error in issuing it."

The Knoxville Civic Improvement Committee, led by Avon Rollins, a SNCC coordinating committee, led ber, has sent down several thousand tons of food to dispossessed Negro families in the Mississippi Delta.

**********

CAMBRIDGE, MARYLAND -- The Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee is continuing a drive for fair employment practices in Cambridge's retail stores. This group, under the leadership of SNCC coordinating committee member Gloria Richardson, has also been engaged in the following: a voter registration and voter education program, a drive to increase employment for Negroes in city, county and state agencies (specifically in the Sheriff's office), a selective buying campaign aimed at Cambridge's stores. an attempt to integrate the Eastern Shore Mental Hospital, filing complaints against local industries with Federal contracts and other activities.

SNCC Confab Set Easter Weekend in Atlanta, Ga.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- The Annual Spring Conference of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee will be held here April 12-14. At least "300 students", SNCC spokesman said, would attend workshops and strategy discussions on the theme, "Emancipation Then -- Freedom Now."

Students will be housed at the Gammon Theological Seminary here for the Easter Weekend. While there is still time, representatives are urged to write to the SNCC office, 6 Raymond Street, N.W., Atlanta 14, Georgia, for applications to attend the conference.

Workshops are scheduled on "Southern Influence on National Politics," "The Hidden Structure and Social Action," "Negro Protest: A History," "Nonviolence: Past and Present," "Community Involvement," and "Problems of the Movement."

48 Jailed In Pine Bluff sits-in

PINE BLUFF AND LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS -- SNCC field workers, in Arkansas since last October, have helped to integrate most public facilities in Little Rock, and are now in Pine Bluff where continuous sit-ins at Woolworth's and Walgreen's are underway.

Most Little Rock lunch counters, some hotels, some restaurants, and a bowling alley desegregated their facilities on January 2, 1963. No incidents occured and the desegregation was announced publicly two weeks later.

Bill Hansen, and Ben Grinnage, and interracial SNCC team, moved from Little Rock to Pine Bluff and were arrested there for vagrancy just after they arrived. About a week later, the two succeeded in organizing the first sit-ins in the history of Pine Bluff.

On February 11, fifteen Arkansas AM & N students were suspended by college President Lawrence A. Davis for their participation in the sit-ins.

Hansen reported that over 48 persons - including SNCC staffer Ben Grinnage - were arrested March 25, 27 and 28 during anti-segregation demonstrations.

White mobs have thrown bricks at demonstrators and participants in mass meetings here. Hansen has been attacked several times, and the windows of the car he and Grinnage were using were smashed one night during a mass meeting.

Project Underway in Dallas County ; 20 Register

SELMA, ALABAMA -- Three field secretaries, two of whom are a newly-married couple, are completing four weeks here since they came to begin a voter registration project.

Bernard and Colia Lafayette and Frank Holloway have set up bi-weekly voter registration classes in Selma, and have taken trips to outlying districts in Dallas and Wilcox Counties. The three are teaching registration procedures to those who wish to register, and are instructing those already registered so that they will be able to teach others.

Frank Holloway described, in a field report, one of the communities they had found in Wilcox County, called Gee's Bend: "This area, up until about 13 years ago, was the most backward area in Alabama and probably the United States. The Negroes in Gee's Bend were living in the most primitive style. They knew nothing of running water, gas or electricity or automation in any form. They were not allowed to come out of Gee's Bend.

"They were born, they lived and they died in Gee's Bend. Because of this they had to intermarry among themselves... During this time the Negroes did not live in houses but they actually lived in little primitive huts. The Federal Government became aware of this situation and built a few houses, barns, etc. ...The situation in Gee's Bend today isn't much better. It still is a very backward place. Very few of the Negroes come out. Most of the children do not attend school, because they have to work in the field. There is still this marrying within their own family. Most of the people know very little about what's going on outside of Gee's Bend."

CROWDED, ISN'T IT? In a jail meant for 140 women, 208 Negro and white demonstrators line up after 413 students were arrested in late February for stand-in demonstrations and picketing at a segregated movie theatre in Baltimore. Students, primarily from Morgan State College, but also from Goucher College and Johns Hopkins, demonstrated at the Northwood theatre under the leadership of the Baltimore Civic Interest Group, a branch of the Maryland CIG. The theatre integrated voluntarily on March 6, and Negro students and members of the community saw films there the next day. On March 12, the Maryland State Legislature passed a state-wide public accommodations law. The campaign against the Northwood Theatre caused one of the highest numbers of arrests in one spot since the sit-in movement began February 1, 1960 in Greensboro, North Carolina.

SNCC Staff sits-in at Howard J.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- Staff members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee have attempted several times to obtain service at a Howard Johnson's restaurant here, but have been refused.

The attempts came after an initial try of staff members en route to Nashville for the SNCC Leadership Training Institute Thanksgiving.

All Howard Johnsons' restaurants in the state of Georgia are segregated, despite a statement by the firm's president that all restaurants and hotels would have to integrate in Atlanta if businessmen wished to hold a World's Fair here.

Field reports on the scene indicate that Negro sharecropping families are barely existing.

Food drives conducted by Friends of SNCC in Chicago, the Southern Conference Educational Fund and CORE in Louisville, students in Ann Arbor, Detroit, Los Angeles, and several other cities will continue until cotton-picking begins again for the thousands of seasonal sharecroppers.

New York. May, 1967

Dear Sir:

THE YOUTH vs. AGE AREA. Of 286 students queried by YOUTH REPORT, 83 (29 percent) felt that age 30 to 32 was the dividing line between themselves and the "older generation." Some felt the barrier appeared even sooner. 58 (or 20-percent) considered age 27 to 29 to be the fence between the generations, while 33 young persons (12 percent) put it at age 24 to 26.

Youth's Brief Span: A kindly scattering of youth placed the generational break in the later thirties. But these were in the minority. (The average age of those who took part in this study was about 20; 34 percent were actually in their twentieth years.) Youth considers, it is plain, that "summer's lease hath all too short a date." However, a study of comments makes it clear that youth, in defining the onset of age, is not thinking in terms of physical changes. It is thinking in terms of changes in attitudes which show up as time passes.

The Signs of Age: Asked what made the "older generation" different from the younger, and how one could tell the two apart, a freshman girl at Los Angeles City College said: "The older generation becomes materially involved. Routine sets in. Life stops being a challenge." A second-year girl science student at the same school had her own simple test for spotting her elders: "They stop accepting the ideas of the younger generation." Another freshman girl: "We are different subcultures, with nothing in common--different tastes in music, clothes, entertainment, outlook."

The Deeper Levels of Difference: Some tried to dig beneath superficialities. "The older people frequently have misunderstood their own natures," said a third-year male psychology major at Loyola University (Chicago). "Today's youth seeks to know himself clearly." A male math major in his junior year at Columbia University contributed: "The older generation is more relaxed. It is not searching for new meanings."

They Say They'll Never Grow Old: Enchantingly, 185, or 66 percent, of 276 young people who expressed themselves on this point, said they did not expect to resemble the present older generation when they came to reach the same dangerous age brackets. Only one-third thought they'd be like their elders after enough years had passed. Asked what they would do to stay different, a California girl sophomore studying art said: "Be open, alive, tolerant, and keep moving." Another remarked: "Always know what is happening." A third: "Be truly alive to the world around you." The Loyola psychology major who had accused his elders of not really knowing themselves, said : "When I know myself I will be able to live a more unpretentious existence. Personal choices will be easier to make."

The Keep Moving Generation: These young people have a sharp sense that the older generation is, in some way, a "stopped" generation, a generation gone static. They appear to feel that the true signs of youth are restless search, inquiry (including self-inquiry), movement. "Why should anybody be relaxed at twenty?" asked a boy of that age. Such young people find that the older generation has lost touch, lacks a sense of environment, doesn't really look at the world with any curiosity. Older people were described to YOUTH REPORT researchers as "closed in," "not aware," "sedate;" they were said to "have lost academic interests," to "have few friends." Young people's self-image is of a generation which is "open," "receptive," "mobile."

A Matter of Life-Styles: Youngsters know they are going to be older some day. But they expect to be able to cling to their own generational patterns, their own life-styles. They are quite conscious of the problem, determined to "win." "We can stay what we are so long as we don't accept anything in life that is pre-packaged for us," said a Radcliffe girl.

THE MARKETING AREA. Desire to be different from the older generation reveals itself in buying patterns. At the most obvious level: Boys once longed for clothes like their father's. Proud day when they went to the store with dad and put on "longies" like his. Kids would consider this ridiculous today; one thing they don't want is to look like pop. They invent new clothes and new haircuts to avoid that. It is interesting that at a time when older people dress and act more youthfully than before, the gap between them and the young has opened out wider than ever.

Why They Like Movies: The trend shows up in such "marketing" facts as that young people don't bother too much about going to Broadway plays, but are enthusiastic followers of movies. Theatre seems to them static, linked with older generation's way of having fun, while movies, in a word, move. Says a Columbia University English major: "The film gives you the possibility of seeing things moving, growing, maturing, ripening. Many young people want to move around, look at different things, not get fixed into lives and careers. Films give you this feeling." And so youth "buys" them.

THE ALCOHOL AREA. Other such differences show up between youth's buying habits and "older generation" buying predilections. 314 young people, questioned by YOUTH REPORT on their tastes in drinking, gave wine a surprisingly high rating. They ranked wine above beer, above whiskey. Students were asked to rate the three drinks on a scale in which the figure 1 represented "excellent," 2 meant "good," 3 "fair," 4 "poor" and 5 "dreadful." Combined national average score for wine was 1.96. The score for whiskey was 2.41, for beer 2.37. (The lower score is the more favorable, since the "1" end of the scale represents greatest approval.)

How the Generations See Whiskey: YOUTH REPORT does not claim all of youth prefers wine over beer and whiskey. It reports merely that these particular young people voted in this particular way. This is in line with YOUTH REPORT's function as a "distant early warning system," spotting trends when they first emerge, and when information about them is scarce. On this basis it can be said that there are certain signs of a swing against hard liquor by some segments of youth, and that this turning-away is deliberate and meaningful.

Not on Moral Grounds: At a "bull session" conducted by Columbia University students to check these findings, it came clear that whiskey and gin are becoming older-generation symbols in the minds of some young people. A sophomore male student, majoring in English, commented typically that he felt himself alienated from "the middle-class, middle-age, whiskey-drinking" crowd. A young girl found herself troubled by the fact that many older persons seem to drink "at any old time," as if constantly in need of escape from themselves. Clear feeling was expressed that adult hard-stuff drinkers stun themselves because they can't face life. Prejudice against cocktail crowd seemed to indicate this is another area in which young people are developing ideas of their own, to which they may cling later in life.

What'll the Girls Have?: Young women went along with men in rating wine ahead of beer or whiskey. But they did not like any of these drinks as much as men did. Men gave wine national average approval rating of 1.85, women put it at 2.12. (Remember, lower score indicates greater enthusiasm.) Males rated beer at 2.02, women scored this beverage at 2.91. Male vote for whiskey was 2.19, the female 2.75. It will be seen that, after wine, males somewhat preferred beer to whiskey, women somewhat preferred whiskey to beer.

THE FOOD AREA. But this supposedly flaming generation preferred ice cream, in this survey, to all three alcoholic drinks, giving it a score of 1.73. The two sexes agreed on this verdict with stunning accuracy, men rating ice cream at 1.74, women at 1.72. Youth's favorite dish, by far, was steak, with a vote of 1.33. Lobster pulled 1.95. Supposedly traditional favorite foods of youth, pie and hamburgers, both came limping in at 2.12. Don't take your ideas about youth's tastes, these days, from the pictures cartoonists draw. Youth picks and chooses on its own, from our culture's vast array of goodies.

THE GIFT AREA. Youth likes to pick the gifts it gets, too. Customary gifts to boys and girls away at school used to be food and clothes, pre-selected by adults, of course. But most favored gifts today, YOUTH REPORT survey discloses, are money and books. National average approval rating on money-as-a-gift was 1.65, on books the figure was 1.77. By contrast, cologne, chosen as a widely-advertised cosmetic used by both sexes, scored 2.69. (Scale is same as above, with 1 standing for "excellent," 2 "good," etc.) Clothes were rated at 2.18, food gifts at 2.23. Money and books of course are gifts which allow wide area of choice to recipients. Fit into today's picture of young person as, basically, a creature who chooses.

THE AREA OF CHOICE. In essence, the much-touted "youth revolt" is really about the right to choose. Issue lies close to the core of the struggle between the generations. Young people feel they have been sent to college theoretically to learn to think for themselves, but that relatively few opportunities are given them to do so. In a Harvard-Radcliffe "bull session" organized to check the point, a Radcliffe senior majoring in social relations said: "I want support from the powers that be, telling me that the process of choice itself is worthwhile, and that I am recognized as capable of choosing."

Right of Selection: "There are too many people helping you make decisions," said another Radcliffe senior girl. "There are tests and advisers for everything. I want to learn to stand alone." A Harvard history student contributed: "We want to be able to select, not swallow things whole." Many feel caught in what one called "the big chute from kindergarten to Ph. D."

The Choosing Generation: Point is of importance to marketers, who are, in effect, now called on to provide large areas of choice, within limits of mass-production necessities. Much the same problem is faced by, say, producers of clothing and presidents of large universities: How to let individual feel he is controlling his own life, while not letting costs get out of hand through providing too many expensive alternatives. He who can provide meaningful choices will most completely win gratitude of youth.

THE CLOTHES AREA. It is a mistake to believe that youth "doesn't care" about what it does, that it is indifferent, heedless, or reckless, or unconcerned. Youth cares about almost everything. That is one of the characteristics of this generation. When asked to choose a "look," a way of dressing, the 314 young people questioned overwhelmingly voted a preference for "looking natural." Asked, next, if perhaps they liked "looking careless," the reaction was one almost of horror. The vote for "looking natural" was 1.42; for "looking careless" it was 3.49, on the same 1-to-5 scale as used above.

How They See Themselves: "Looking prosperous" failed to please these students, drawing a score of 2.83. The idea of "looking interesting" was more attractive, garnering an average approval quotient of 1.84. (As before, the lower the score, the greater the approval shown.) "Looking well-groomed" won considerable enthusiasm, with a grade mark of 1.61. But "looking sharp" raised hackles, and drew 2.48. The "natural look" won.

It Isn't Carelessness: However a young person seems to look, one can be almost sure he or she looks that way on purpose. Some obscure political or social point may be being made by unkempt hair, odd garments, etc., but carelessness probably has little or nothing to do with the total effect.

THE CULTURE AREA. A growing interest of youth is "pop" culture. Among young intellectuals today there is great enjoyment of low-level mass media, late evening television, all night disk jockeys, rock 'n' roll radio. New interest shows up in such campus games as "Trivia," very popular at Columbia University, a contest built around remembering minute details of old "B" movies, now being reshown on television. Tiny and virtually meaningless old sports statistics are also included.

Following the Teeny-Boppers: Campuses are very conscious of the tastes of "teeny-boppers"--young adolescent girls who scream approval of various youthful musical "groups." Columbia University intellectuals can often discourse on the various schools of rock 'n' roll, the Motown (Detroit) sound of the 4 Tops, the "soul sound" of Jackie Wilson, the "psychedelic sound" of the Byrds, the Animals, the "California sound" of the Mamas and the Papas. "Crawdaddy," rock 'n' roll magazine, is heavily read on campus.

Moving Toward Something?: There is little that is new in appreciation of classical music, it is felt. A Columbia University "bull session" on culture came up with opinion that classical music is static, frozen in its patterns, while "pop" music is "moving," using electronic effects, new rhythms, trying out Oriental tone patterns. Thus again we hear the theme: Youth is interested in movement, pace, change.

The Meaning of Movement: It is sometimes useful to look into the etymology of a word to capture its deeper meanings. "Move," according to the Oxford English Dictionary, means: "To put or keep in motion; to shake, stir or disturb"--not bad descriptives of youth's efforts today. Further definitions: "To stir up or excite (an emotion, appetite, etc.) in a person; to provoke (laughter, contradiction)." These old meanings of the word move may be speaking to us through youth. Skeat, in his famous Etymological Dictionary, traces the word "move" to "mob," through "mobile." The moving crowd. This is what we have with us today.

Sincerely,

Samuel Grafton

UNION OF VIETNAMESE STUDENTS IN FRANCE

Vietnamese students' appeal to the American students

Dear American Friends,

Permit us to address this appeal to you at a time when the American escalation is accelerating its pace, gravely threatening peace in Southeast Asia and the whole world. We are certain that we voice the sentiments of thousands of Vietnamese students, scientists and engineers living in France when we affirm our solidarity with all of our people who are struggling for the sacred cause of freedom and independence.

No one could be more attached to the cause of peace than the Vietnamese people, who for more than a quarter of a century have experienced the sufferings of war. But, just as for the American people during the Revolutionary War, for our people there can be no peace if they are denied their independence. Moreover, our rights to independence and national unity were solemnly recognized in the Geneva Agreements of 1954 on Vietnam.

It goes without saying that we feel no hatred for you or for the American people. We would prefer to discuss with you our studies and the concerns shared by all youth. In the 1960's, a natural topic for our discussions might be, for example, how living standards and human welfare could be improved in the whole world through the development of science and technology.

Unfortunately, our country has been invaded by American troops who come to sow death and desolation. Unfortunately, you, too, can be required at any moment by the Johnson Administration to journey to our homeland, on the pretext that you would be fighting for the cause of liberty and for humanity.

We know that some of you have refused to go to Vietnam and that many of you are fighting courageously to have your government put an end to its policy of aggression against our country. We are addressing you today so that we may help each other mutually to make the cause of truth triumph.

The Johnson administration repeats day in and day out that American troops are in Vietnam « to help the South Vietnamese people defend themselves against aggression from the North ». In reality, they are there to support people - yesterday Ngo dinh Diem, today Nguyen cao Ky - who, to say the least, have no popular support whatever.

If our compatriots in the South were led to take up arms, it is because they were subjected, in the name of anti-communism, to the dictatorial puppet regime of Ngo dinh Diem, who refused to hold the elections which were supposed to take place in 1956 in oder to reunify the country, and who declared in May 1957 in Washington that « the frontier of the United States passes through the 17th parallel ». Until 1960 our people fought with all the legal means possible against the bloody dictatorship of Diem, which was supported and aided by the United States. But confronted with the massacres, the deportations and the large-scale use of American materiel and methods of war, the people of South Vietnam had no choice left but to take up arms in self-defense.

One day you will certainly know the details of the indescribable sufferings endured by our compatriots in the South during all these terrible years ; you will know that in the period before the direct and massive intervention of American troops in the South at the beginning of 1965, 170,000 Vietnamese were killed, nearly 800,000 wounded or disabled as a result of torture, and more than 5 million peasants forced into 8,000 concentration camps camouflaged under the name of « strategic hamlets ». One day, you will learn of the courageous battle waged by all strata of the population, particularly the peasants, in opposing the ferocious repression. You will learn also of the no less courageous combat of professors and students in our Southern cities.

Despite this terror and the open war waged with 500,000 men of the puppet army under the command of 30,000 American « advisors », at the beginning of 1965 the Saigon army and administration were heading toward collapse. It was to try and save them that a huge American expeditionary corps was brought into South Vietnam, and that, in total defiance of legality, the decision was taken by President Johnson to bomb the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

This policy springs from the illusion that it is possible, through armed force alone, to achieve a quick military victory and impose one's ideas upon a people. This explains the origin of the war and why it has continually been expanded.

Today President Johnson has engaged in South Vietnam, a country slightly larger than the state of Ohio, « more than one half of (U.S.) air power, more than one third of (its) ground forces ready for combat, and one third of (its) Navy » (1). Already the size of the American forces in South Vietnam is greater than that engaged in the Korean War. According to Mr McNamara, in 1966 American aircraft alone dropped 637,000 tons of bombs on North and South Vietnam. Our entire country numbers around 30 million inhabitants, which means that last year, more than 40 pounds of bombs were used for every Vietnamese, not counting an enormous quantity of other projectiles fired by ground and naval forces. And the United States is now dropping an even greater quantity of bombs (2).

Moreover, when thousands of people have been deported - as in the course of operation « Cedar Falls » last January - entire villages razed by bulldozers, vast forested regions set ablaze with phosphorus, heavily populated areas designated as « free kill zones », etc..., don't you think that such methods are strangely reminiscent of those used not so long ago by the Nazis in search of their « final solution » ?

And how can one believe today the myth of an « invasion » of the South by our Northern compatriots, when the Vietnamese of the North and South are one people, engaged in a single struggle against the same aggressor ? Do not the people of North Vietnam have the right to render assistance to the people of the South, when a foreign army has invaded South Vietnam ? At the heart of this question of a northern « invasion » is the undeniable fact that the war arose out of the American-imposed dictatorship of Ngo dinh Diem ; the only invasion of Vietnam was by American troops who came to protect an American puppet against popular resistance. Even according to U.S. government figures, South Vietnamese comprise the overwhelming majority of the forces combatting American troops in South Vietnam. In reality this is an American war, carried out by Americans to conquer the Vietnamese people who are defending their right to independence and national unity. Perhaps it is surprising to you that « anti-americanism in Vietnam, particularly in the cities, is growing and becoming a matter of increasing debate in the American mission. The argument is over the effects of what one observer called the new colonialism ». (The Washington Post, January 25, 1967).

In spite of this unrestrained use of force which costs your people the enormous sum of 24 billion dollars a year, none of the American objectives has been obtained. To date more than 1700 planes have been downed in North Vietnam and hundreds of pilots captured (3). The economic and military potential of North Vietnam continues to develop despite the terrible intensity of the bombing. The bombings have obviously failed to produce the expected results, as Mr McNamara himself has implied. In the South of our country, the National Liberation Front recently announced, 270,000 enemy soldiers, including 120,000 Americans, were killed, wounded or taken prisoner in 1966 (4). The N.L.F. armed forces, far from diminishing, have appreciably increased, as General Westmoreland has acknowledged. « American

(2) McNamara statement in Aviation Week, Jan. 30, 1967.
« During February 1967, American aircraft dropped 68,000 tons of bombs on North and South Vietnam, which compares with 80,000 tons a month during the peak year of World War II and 17,000 tons a month during the Korean War. Top U.S. officials have forecast that the bombing of North and South Vietnam, which already is approaching the bombing peaks of all previous wars, will continue to rise ». (New York Times, Intern. Edition, March 18 - 19, 1967).

(3) « The United States in the past has been losing warplanes faster than it has been producing them. This was true up to October, 1966 ». (Report by the Senate Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee, The New York Herald Tribune, International edition, March 28, 1967).

(4) U.S. figures list a smaller number of casualties. Might it not be possible that casualties among American troops have been concealed as has been proven to be the case with U.S. aircraft losses ?

military men in Vietnam, unlike the Washington optimists, believe it would take a decade - or a generation - to pacify the country. And there is no certainty it could be done at all ». (The New York Times, December 5, 1966).

Meanwhile, the escalation has only reinforced the determination of our entire people to smash the aggression and win, whatever the sacrifices. The real choice facing the Vietnamese people is not one between peace and war, but, in fact, a choice between genuine independence and servitude.

It is not for us to judge the value of the « American way of life ». You belong to the most prosperous nation in the world and your country has made many contributions to the scientific and technological heritage of humanity, of which you can be proud. But what would you say if someone imposed on you from outside the dictatorship of a George Lincoln Rockwell who, like General Nguyen cao Ky, is an admirer of Hitler ? (5) It is so difficult for you to understand that the National Liberation Front encompasses all the democratic forces of South Vietnam in opposition to the worst sort of fascist regime, imposed from abroad ? How would you feel about an attempt to impose on you a way of life different from your own, by killing your family and bombing your cities and villages ? You would agree with us in recognizing that ideas cannot be imposed by force.

In the opinion of the Johnson administration, this war will cause you « more cost, more loss, and more agony » (6), for one cannot conquer a united people which is conscious of its inexhaustible capacity of resistance and has given proof of it on the battlefield. Furthermore, the profoundly unjust and atrocious character of the war, the intensive use of the most murderous weapons (napalm, fragmentation bombs, poison gas and toxic chemicals, etc...) to massacre the civilian population (to which Harrison Salisbury has recently testified in the New York Times and William F. Pepper in Ramparts magazine (7)), has made international opinion rise up against its perpetrators.

All of this is enough to lead the United States towards an inevitable failure.

We are convinced that sooner or later the just cause of Vietnam will triumph. The interest of both our peoples requires that this illegal and immoral war be ended, so that Vietnamese and Americans may no longer die in battle ; so that the prestige of your country, and the democratic principles of your society in which you take such pride, may decline no further ; and so that the best conditions for friendly relations between our two peoples may be established.

The Vietnamese problem cannot and will not be settled through some sort of political deal which would leave our country divided forever and sacrifice the inalienable rights of our people. A settlement must be based on United States respect for the independence, sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Vietnam. That is the essential content of the four-point position of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the Declaration in five points of the National Liberation Front. The United States must definitively and unconditionally halt the bombings of North Vietnam ; recognize the N.L.F., the sole genuine representative of the South Vietnamese people ; and withdraw all its troops and those of its satellites from South Vietnam. Our people are more determined than ever to fight until such a peace is realized. To claim that they are merely pawns in a conflict among the great world powers is to do them a great wrong. The program of the N.L.F. clearly shows that it intends to establish democratic institutions in South Vietnam with a government of national union, capable of grouping all the political and the religious organizations and eminent individuals, regardless of their past activities ; this government will have a foreign policy of strict neutrality and will establish relations with all countries.

(5) According to Brian Mohayan of the London Sunday Mirror (July 4, 1965) Ky said : « People ask me who my heroes are. I have only one : Hitler... The situation is so desperate now that one man would not be enough. We need four or five Hitlers in Vietnam ».

(6) State of the Union message of President Johnson, January 10, 1967.

(7) « The horror of what we are doing to the children of Vietnam - « we » because napalm and white phosphorous are the weapons of America - is staggering... Napalm, and its more horrible companion, white phosphorous liquidize young flesh and carve it into grotesque forms. The little figures are afterward often scarcely human in appearance... At least a quarter of a million of the children of Vietnam have been killed in the war... There must be three times that many wounded - or at least a million child casualties since 1961... At least 80 % of the injuries were inflicted by American or South Vietnam (Saigon) action... » (William F. Pepper in Ramparts magazine, January 1967).

« YOU DON'T get rid of the terrorist by bombing, because if you drop a bomb and kill 20 persons, 19 of them are women and children... and there's only one terrorist... » (U.S. Ambassador Lodge, as quoted in the Boston Globe, February 28, 1965).

President Johnson has proclaimed many times that the United States is ready to undertake « unconditional discussions of peace - anywhere, any time » and « will continue to take every possible initiative ourselves to probe for peace » (8).

If he sincerely desires peace, if he really wants discussions, he can easily prove it by unconditionally ceasing the bombing raids and all other acts of war against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. Only then could conversations be held between the D.R.V. and the U.S., as was recently declared by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Nguyen Duy Trinh. The bombing of territory of the D.R.V., a sovereign and independent country, constitutes an intolerable violation of the Geneva Agreements of 1954 and of the basic rules of international law, and provokes the unanimous condemnation of the entire world. The United States has no right to require from the victim of aggression any counterpart whatever to the cessation of bombing. Besides, bombing and threats will never make our compatriots in the North agree to discussions. Unfortunately, we know the response of President Johnson to this gesture of good faith from the D.R.V. : an acceleration of the escalation, going so far as to mine the rivers of North Vietnam to block the movement of the sampans and junks !

Thus we find that the words of peace of the American leaders simply serve to camouflage and justify their intensification of the war. Contrary to what he has affirmed, President Johnson has blocked all the paths to negotiation ; in fact, what he wants to obtain from our people is an « unconditional surrender » (9).

Student friends, the United States has to give up its policy of force and of blackmail by force. The more of you there are who try to understand why the Vietnamese struggle so resolutely, and why you are asked to fight, the sooner this will come about. Our aim in writing to you is not to convince you of the desirability of the institutions our compatriots in the South will establish for themselves in the future. The point is to help you understand us, so that you will see why we refuse to live in slavery or to allow our fate to be dictated by a foreign government.

We would like to ask you to publish our letter in your newspapers and mazagines so that it can reach American students. We know that some of you will disagree with some of our views, but we would be most willing to discuss any of these points with you further, and we hope that you will answer us, as soon and as fully as possible.

Let us all work together to establish an exchange of views and to clear up the misunderstandings that may still separate us. Your future, as well as ours, will depend a great deal on the outcome of this effort.

Please accept our sincerest feelings of friendship.

Dear Friend:

The Southern Student Organizing Committee grew out of a need for increased communication and coordination among students committed to changing the South. Through our efforts in the Civil Rights Movement, we have learned that people work most effectively within their natural constituency; that they are most interested in working on issues affecting them directly, and that students can be a dynamic force for social change. And we have now progressed to a multi-issue approach toward changing the South.

We have been and are presently involved in many university reform movements, in community organizing projects such as the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee, in support for the migrant labor workers organizing efforts, in organizing a student alliance with the Textile workers in North Carolina and in continuing campus organizing and service projects such as the Virginia Speakers Program, the Southern Folk Festival, the Florida Peace Tour, a speedy literature service, conferences, and the New South Student.

We can never create a democratic South unless we challenge the basic prejudices and misconceptions that plague our society and contribute to popular support for U.S. foreign policy and bitter anti-communism based on the myth of a monolithic communist threat, racism, and the assumption that human and political problems can be solved through violence.

We are also faced with a moral imperative; our government daily murders hundreds of individuals who only want the right to determine their own fate. We must actively oppose our Government's policy in Vietnam and challenge basic assumptions underlying all of U.S. foreign policy. If we do not act now, we must not only share the blame for our government's slaughter of innocent people, but we may make it easier for the powerful supporters of the status quo to negate any moves for progressive social change and suppress all dissent by stirring up super-patriotic and anti-communist hysteria.

Just this past year in the South, opposition to the war has grown tremendously. There have been rallies, vigils or demonstrations in over forty Southern communities. In addition several hundred church, college and community groups have sponsored speakers, watched films, and held meetings to discuss and debate the various aspects of U.S. policy in Vietnam. We must now expand and intensify discussion on the war and mobilize visible opposition to the administration's policies.

To assist Southerners who wish to speak out concerning the war, the Southern Student Organizing Committee (at its Annual Convention) officially allied itself with "Vietnam Summer". In cooperation with groups such as the Southern Conference Educational Fund, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and the American Friends Service Committee, SSOC is helping to start local community projects and to recruit volunteers.

Sue Thrasher, who worked with SSOC since its inception, is the Southern contact in the Cambridge office of Vietnam Summer; she will use a WATS line to call interested Southerners and provide assistance to local organizing efforts. Lee Webb, a well-known SSOC member who recently did a speaking tour of the South for SSOC is the National Director of Vietnam Summer. Tom Gardner is the Southern Field Representative for Vietnam Summer and will spend most of his time travelling, helping people develop projects and recruiting volunteers; he will work out of the Nashville SSOC office. Three SSOC-affiliated field staff, Alan Levin in Florida, Ben Ragsdale in Virginia, and Sara Boyte in North Carolina, are working with Vietnam Summer in their respective states.

Individuals and groups in Atlanta, Gainesville, Miami, Jacksonville, Sarasota, New Orleans, Birmingham, Jackson, Memphis, Little Rock, Nashville, Louisville, Richmond, Charlottesville, Lexington, Durham, and Chapel Hill are planning summer activities on the war and the draft. Hopefully concerned people in other communities are doing the same. If you can get together with allies in your community and inform others of your concerns we would like to help you.

For further information, for applications to be a full-time worker, and to find out who is doing what in your area, write to Vietnam Summer, attn: Sue Thrasher, 129 Mt. Auburn Street, Cambridge, Mass. 02138. (If necessary, you may call her person-to-person collect 617-492-6700, she will refuse and call you back on the WATS line).

For assistance in Virginia write to Ben Ragsdale, Vietnam Summer, 4500 Kensington Ave., Richmond, Va., phone 703-359-0697.

In Florida write to Alan Levin, Box 13636, Univ. Sta., Gainesville, Fla., phone 904-372-7227.

In North Carolina write to Sara Boyte, Box 4561, Duke Station, Durham, North Carolina, 27706.

For specific requests and assistance in the South, contact Tom Gardner, SSOC, Box 6403, Nashville, Tenn. 37212, Phone 615-291-3537.

If you are not able to contribute some of your time this summer you might like to contribute financially. For tax deductible contributions to work in the South, make checks payable to SSOC and mark them for Vietnam Summer. You may also be able to contribute directly to a project in your area.

Whatever you are able to do will be of great assistance. Thank you and good luck.

For Peace and Freedom,

The Righteous Rightists

IRA S. ROHTER

REPRINTED FROM TRANS-ACTION MAGAZINE, WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

● The Watts riots have been traced directly to plans laid down by Lenin in Moscow. (The Los Angeles Communists, who organized the riots, cleverly blew up their own headquarters in order to appear as innocent martyrs.)

● Progressive education (a term including most modern educational methods) was inaugurated by a Columbia University professor on his return from Moscow: it is a deliberate design to expedite the Red take-over by turning our children into un-Christian, un - American, mindless, and will - less robots. For proof of success, we have only to look at Berkeley.

The two stories above -much more heavily elaborated and "documented" -are typical of the items that appear in radical right publications. They illustrate well the characteristic that distinguishes radical rightists from other Americans.

Radical rightists are not merely conservatives or even arch-conservatives. What occupies them full time, what gives them their unique voltage and drive, is not their reverence for old-fashioned fiscal policies and morals, but what Richard Hofstadter calls their "paranoid style"-the overriding and galvanizing belief in a gigantic, insidious Communist conspiracy that has infiltrated and infected all levels of American government and most of its social institutions. The calm conservative who would merely like to see a balanced budget and less welfare is not really a rightist, and they both know it.

Another distinct characteristic by which the rightist (I call him that for brevity) may be known is his dedication to action. When the enemy is already within the gates attacking all that we hold dear, the true patriot does not sit idly by discussing the income tax or civil rights-he mounts the counter-attack.

For the purposes of this study, therefore, (and because membership lists and other identifications are often secret) I have used these two characteristics-belief in Communist conspiracy and in direct action-to define and describe rightists, and I have drawn my samples accordingly.

WHO'S RIGHT?

How do people get to be rightists? A major thesis of this article is that rightists are the victims of status frustration. That is, for some reason they are dissatisfied or insecure about their places in society and feel that others do not esteem them sufficiently: further, they express their frustration, and compensate for it, by political and social acts which give them emotional identity and support as well as real influence.

Many psychologists regard the striving for self-regard as an essential social and psychological need. To a large extent self-regard must depend on how others regard us. Nobody can really tolerate feeling downgraded or ignored: he must make some defense. The rightist chooses the path of radical right ideology and action, which pinpoints and personifies his enemy as a horrendous evil (and the rightist, therefore, as a kind of St. George) and gives him a means to combat it-not merely for himself but as a champion for all decent mankind.

The rightist becomes loudly super-patriotic-which makes anyone disagreeing suspect of un- Americanism. Those who are higher or richer than he (as the Communist- infiltrated world sees them) or who possess different values can be pulled down to their true levels - below the rightist on the scale of virtue-by being exposed as "Communist".

DUEL WITH THE DEVIL

Of course, such an orientation-and such action - depend heavily on a highly charged emotionalism and a closed system of paraniod-like logic that is impervious to objective facts that happen to differ. For instance, Communism cannot be considered primarily a political, social, and economic movement and system of thought capable of objective study. Such an idea horrifies the rightist. Communism is Satan personified: it can be faced only in a fight to the death, and only by those properly armed and innoculated.

People who undergo status frustration generally fall into three categories: the decliners, the new arrivals, and the value keepers.

THE DECLINERS. These are the people in our modern, changing society who are going down in the social scale - undeservedly, as they see it.

Modern technology and modern organizations increasingly require new skills, new orientations, more education. Those trained under different and outmoded disciplines (small farmers, for instance) and those with insufficient or outdated educations must feel their positions becoming more and more insecure.

Also threatened are the old professional and entrepreneur classes, especially from the smaller communities: the small town general practitioner in medicine, the small home builder, gas station owner, neighborhodd grocer - in fact most independent operators trying to survive in the shadows of the great corporations, large labor unions, and big government agencies. The well - educated professionals and corporate executives are taking over the small businessman's role in the community. He is being shoved aside: the hard work and independence on which he had built his self-esteem and his concept of the good and righteous life become increasingly worthless and irrelevent/ He begins to ask why? Who is doing this to me?

A similar process affects workers, both white and blue collar, displaced by new methods and machinery. They find themselves useless, and their self-regard wavers. The elderly without funds are in an even worse situation-our society no longer respects age, especially when it pulls no economic weight.

As these groups decline, their consciousness of rejection is made even more acute by the rise of those formerly considered low-class or rejected. An Irish Catholic, grandson of an immigrant, is elected President: a Negro "agitator" receives many honors and confers frequently at the White House. Jews are everywhere in prominent places. Again the decliner-often of old white stock-asks why?

THE NEW ARRIVALS. Status frustration occurs not only on the way down, but on the way up. There is almost always a lag between the time the gauche new arrival achieves success and the time those who got there first accept him as an equal. Like the decliner he can easily feel that he has come into a closed and unfriendly society that will not recognize virtue. He is especially upset since he earned it himself in the good old American way instead of being handed prestige on a silver platter.

To the newly arrived, radical rightism can be a potent weapon to destroy their mighty enemies-those who had the opportunity to be better educated, better mannered, more cosmopolitan, and, obviously, more prone to liberal ideas and "bohemian" behaviour and immoralities. The charge of "Communism" is a great leveler, and the newly rich can often be counted upon to be twice as narrowly patriotic as anybody.

THE VALUE KEEPERS. Those moving up or down the ladder of success are bound to find themselves, temporarily at least, among aliens who know not the Lord, but so should those who merely stand still long enough in a society that changes as fast as ours.

A person of any conviction or integrity has social and moral values and beliefs that help determine his behaviour, his self-definition, and his place in the community. But let the community begin to re-examine those values criticaaly or displace them with others, and the foundation of his whole universe begins to turn to sand.

For the great majority of us, many of the traditional rural or small town ways or virtues are no longer useful or true. Modern society needs education and expertise more than hard work and self-denial: an expanding economy rather than thrift: organized community welfare programs rather than primary reliance on savings, personal charity, relatives, and contemplation of the sufferings of Job.

Moreover, the preponderance of political and economic power, for good or ill, has definitely shifted from the country with its white settlers to the metropolis with its combinations of minority populations. Those whose beliefs and behaviour were shaped by older traditions-who, as they see it, settled and built this country - now find themselves, in effect, increasingly disinherited.

Even more important than the objective loss of power and prestige are the subjective feelings of loss, of being desplaced and discredited. God and the devil, good and evil, are absolutes and do not change: therefore the change that discredits and displaces the old morality must be evil triumphing over good. Only by such rationalization can true believers retain their orientation and self-regard.

The values defended include hard work, saving, prudent investment, and self-discipline-the Protestant ethic. As the name implies, these values are not only economic but moral, with deep psychological meaning. They are supposed to result in independence and individualism, as the rightist sees them. An apparent attack on them - such as increased government control or taxes -becomes not only an economic change but an immorality and must be answered.

Therefore,as experience demonstrates daily, those most closely identified with older traditional values reduce and discuss almost all social problems to moralistic terms: if the wayward society or individual would only cease transgression and return to the old tried-and-true paths of religion, decency, and family virtue, all would in time be well.

This accounts for much of the intense and emotional opposition to social change by rightists: the counterattack, often blind, to government controls, integration, religious secularism, welfare, the United Nations, foriegn aid, Supreme Court decisions, modern education, and even such apparently non-controversial scientific and health advances as flouridation and mental health programs.

Fundamentalism is an important source of rightist fervor. In fact, from their titles and rhetoric, it is hard to distinguish between a rightist political rally and an evangelistic campaign-note the Rev. Carl McIntire's "Twentieth Century Reformation" and Dr. Fred Schwarts' "Christian Anti-Communist Crusade." Communism, a twentieth century abomination, becomes the catch - all for everything that seems evil and unnacceptable in the easygoing, affluent, sophisticated, urban twentieth century.

These then are the theses advanced about the rightist which I tested in this study:

Rightists are people underdoing status frustration. They feel they do not have the prestige and power they should have if the world were just-and their enemies have too much. They are on the move as far as status is concerned-either they are going down in a changing world (which should be true of most of them), they are standing still as the world passes them by, or they are rising more rapidly in economic position than in social recognition.

They identify themselves with the older, traditional (Protestant ethic) values of work, religion, and morality, so that their fight for status recognition also becomes a crusade for truth, justice, decency, God, and America.

They believe that their troubles-and therefore also the attack against Christianity and America-are caused by an all-pervasive conspiracy, wholly evil and implacable, called Communism.

They relieve their anxieties and feelings of resentment and inadequacy by radical right belief and activity. This gives them an effective explanation and compensation for their difficulties, a means of bringing their enemies down, and a method of gaining power, prestige, and mutual support.

Do these hypotheses survive empirical examination?
To start with objective findings first: Are the rightists of our sample actually undergoing status mobility and frustration?

The data show that there are only 10 percent of rightists in the highest occupations, such as executives and professionals, compared to 24 percent of non-rightists: and that rightists are over-represented among the lower-middle class (such as clerical and salesworkers)-15 to 4 percent.

Further, nearly twice as many rightists as others are retired-removed, for most practical purposes, from economic importance to society altogether. Rightists also tend to be older (median age 54 compared to 45) and are more often self-employed (although at lower levels)-if businessmen, they tend to run smaller businesses; if professionals, their standing is lower.

In profile, therefore, the radical rightist is older, less secure financially, and less often an important part of a major modern industrial enterprise; he more often has a low prestige white collar job or is thrown on his own resources-retired or operator of a marginal "independent" business. Such a picture is quite consistent with the status frustration hypothesis; such a person, especially if he identifies with an older tradition that was once dominant, could hardly help feeling frustrated.

Occupation alone, however, is not enough to measure social standing. What of education? In our increasingly sophisticated society, education is not only a necessity but a mark of prestige, especially in the middle and upper classes. But even in these occupational strata the rightists have less education than their non-rightist equivilants. In the highest levels (high executives, proprietors, major professionals, etc.) almost twice as many non-rightists as rightists have graduate degrees (64 percent to 33 percent) while three times as many rightists (I2 percent to 4 percent) never went beyond high school. In the middle levels over twice as many non-rightists got college degrees (27 percent to I2 percent) while over twice as many rightists (54 percent to 24) never went beyond high school.

DOWN AND TO THE RIGHT

What about mobility? Comparing a male rightist's (or a female rightist's husband's) occupation and education with those of his father we found, as hypothesized, that the rightist did undergo much more status mobility than non - rightists, most often downward.

In the lowest occupations (typically, unskilled blue - collar) the rightists had fallen farther and more consistently than the non-rightists had done anywhere. Thirty-eight percent of rightist men compared to 6 percent non-rightist had declined sharply. Rightist laborers were quite apt to have had middle class or farm-owning fathers.

In the middle groups (white collar, small business) rightists were more mobile, both up and down, than non-rightists. Relatively few had stayed at the same occupational and educational level as their fathers (I4 to 29 percent). There tended to be a few more losers than winners.

In the highest status, however, rightists on the way up surpass not only those on the way down but even the relatively static non-rightists. This fits in very well with the thesis that the "newly arrived" undergo status frustration.

As predicted, therefore, the rightists had significantly greater mobility, especially downward, and less education where it counted most.

Another way to measure mobility should be by length of residence in a neighborhood. The old fundamentalist morality is closely associated with a rural and small town past: many people from that background, who cling to the old standards, have moved to a faceless Babylon of a city where they have few skills they can use. Those on the way down-or in from the farm-must move into poorer neighborhoods: those on the way up, though they take their values and their accents with them, are most likely, as soon as possible, to move to higher status suburbs or neighborhoods. Those who stay the shortest time should therefore be the most mobile.

Studying length of residence of people under 50, we found two basic groups of rightists. One seems to be primarily composed of people new to the community who seem unable to accept or be accepted by that community; also, they are declining in status more rapidly than a similar group of equally mobile non-rightists.

The other rightist cluster is composed of old-timers who have lived in their communities most of their adult lives: they are considerably older than their neighbors, and many more turn up in the 50 and 60 brackets. Their neighborhoods have gone down, and they have declined in status with them. Here too, therefore, there seems a clear association between decline (whether in new or old residency) and radical rightism.

THAT OLD TIME RELIGION

Are rightists to any significant extent fundamentalists? Belief in traditional values, along with many rightist attitudes, was earlier related to religious fundamentalism. Empirically, this is true. Rightists very much subscribe to fundamentalist tenets and belong to those churches; nearly half the rightists (44 percent compared to I7 percent of the non - rightists ) are affiliated with fundamentalist denominations. Rightists were also more often raised in rural areas or small towns, environments most likely to produce traditionalism and hostility toward modernity.

So much for objective factors. How do the people themselves view their plights?

Fewer rightists than non-rightists actually belong to the upper class; but more of them rated themselves "upper class". When asked, "How hard do you think it is for people today to move upward from one social class to another?" their answers revealed a view of society as essentially closed, dominated by personalities, controlled by the wrong kinds of people:

Not much opportunity anymore; it's getting harder; depends on having money, knowing the right people.

The views of the non-rightists were much more objective and impersonal:

Depends on education; must work hard and have abilities to get it; special skills; hard to change direction of early life....

We asked, "Do you think that people ....influential in this community are, in general, friendly or cliqish?" Rightists answered "cliquish and unfriendly" more often than non-rightists. When those answering "cliquish" were asked to give reasons, rightists more often indicated belief in a closed structure run by a small group:

Old residents tend to look on new people as outsiders; certain families run things here; segregated groups want their own way; all have common political views.

The rightist, then, more often sees himself as the outsider, discriminated against in a closed society run by an elite.

What about the predicted concern with the Protestant ethic? We asked, "Are there any differences between what you believe should be the American way of life, and the way things are done in the country nowadays?" "In what way are things different?" Typically, from the rightists:

Morality and standards are going bad; the American way of life is deteriorating because of a suppression of morality; we nedd a moral and spiritual revival among our leaders; we need to follow the Ten Commandments more.

RUGGED INDIVIDUALISTS

What about individual initiative, self-reliance, respect for authority?

I am worried about the drift of the country; the amount of crime and disrespect for authority shows things are going the other way; we must instill more emphasis on respect, integrity, and individual responsibility; parents aren't teaching their children the right things anymore.

Traditional morality and values dominate many rightist's perceptions of everything. No matter what the topic-what things they worried about, what community concerns they had, what qualities they admired, what things Communists actually believed in, whatever-sooner or later they indicated that if we would only return to the old morality every problem would be solved.

Our findings are clear: The rightists are more dissatisfied with the values of contemporary American society; they adhere to the 'old truths" and believe everyone else should 'return' to them. They suffer severe frustration because of this, a frustration heavily reinforced by a religious righteousness expressed in absolute and positive terms.

"In your case.....do you think that everyone gives you as much respect as you feel you deserve?" This question was deliberately worded to emphasize extremes-yet rightists answered "no" more frequently than non-rightists. This is true both of rightists who are on the way up and those on the way down; but the declimers say "no" twice as often as those on the rise - emphasizing that it is the losers who are most impelled to seek radical rightism. (Presumably, once those on the rise secure recognition, they will cease attacking high - status people and changing times.) Rightists felt more unaccepted than non-rightists, and rightists on the decline more unaccepted than anybody.

Does joining radical right organizations and causes help the rightist combat his anxieties successfully? By being more patriotic and anti - Communist than anybody else, the rightist seems to wrap himself in greatness and goodness, in importance, righteousness, and self-satisfaction. He is a saviour carrying out a holy crusade. As the John Birch Society Bulletin (Nov. 1964) points out, if you join their society "....you feel a tremendous satisfaction....to save for our children and their children the glorious country and humane civilization which we ourselves inherited."

We asked them to select "two great Americans" and describe what is admirable about them. Later, we asked them to describe "the typical member of an anti-Communist group" -that is, in effect, an idealized version of themselves. Their great people, they said, were "true" Americans and "very" patriotic; 75 percent found the same things true of themselves (compared to 22 percent of non-rightists, who tended to use less extravagant terms). Courage, strength, and "guts" were likewise qualities they shared with the great, as was deep Christian faith and high moral standards. And 50 percent saw the great to be honest, truthful, and sincere - like themselves.

Non - rightists, however, viewed rightists very differently-"dishonest," "hypocrites," "no integrity," "use character assasination."

This tactic of rightists to acquire status and importance by associating themselves closely with the great and the good is perhaps best illustrated by their emphasis on "self - education." They are, in fact, less well-educated than the non - rightists. But the world of radical rightism is full of parades of quasi-experts, study groups, monographs, footnotes, and bibliographies-almost all with no standing among scholars. But the rightists study them avidly, mention intelligence and education highly among those things they admire in the great, and give themselves strong ratings as "intellectuals, very brilliant," "well informed," "people with sound judgment, good reasoning," and "lots of sense." Needless to add, non-rightists hold almost precisely the opposite views of them.

THE RIGHTIST PERSONALITY

The need to relieve status anxiety and to attack values that do not conform to their beliefs are not enough to explain why some people become radical rightists and others, in like circumstances, do not. The rightist tends also to have certain personality characteristics-to be, in effect, a particular kind of human being.

SIMPLISM. Psychologists say that a basic need of man is his desire for meaning, to understand what is happening to him. In an important sense the rightist, a traditionalist in changing times, is adrift in frightening darkness-he needs landmarks, he needs simple guidelines, before he loses direction altogether. Radical rightism gives him this "understanding"-and this security. All becomes clear and very simple. It is all a conspiracy. Nothing is really changed-God is still in His heaven; but He needs help.

Extremely simple explanations have great attractions for the confused. They are a necessity for those personalities who have what psychologists call "simplistic cognitive structure"-who have a strong need for simple, firm stereotyped views of people and events, with no place for ambivalence or ambiguity. Such persons reject unbelievers, need external authorities, and, for emotional reasons, hold their beliefs so rigidly that compromise is intolerable.

Testing for this rigidity of belief, using statements on Communism and Russia ("Communism is a total evil." "The Soviet Union is 'mellowing'."), on intolerance and ambiguity ("There is usually only one right way to do anything."), on anti-compromise and closed-minded stances ("The compromise of principle leads to nothing but destruction." "A group which tolerates too much difference of opinion cannot exist for long"), we found the rightist to fit this description. He is intolerant of ambiguity, opposed to compromise, and closed-minded.

EXTRA PUNITIVENESS. It is difficult not to be struck by the strident negativism and combativeness of rightist writings, thought, and speech. Terrible things exist all about, the future is steeped in gloom; everything is in strong blacks and whites - the forces of light are locked in mortal combat with the forces of darkness. It is not only necessary, therefore, but moral and virtuous to be resentful, discontented, belligerent, and full of hate. While the rightist justifies his behaviour in the name of Americanism and anti-Communism, the actual thrust of his attacks are against the political, social, and intellectual leaders of the community-those who have the respect and influence he does not.

This vehement scapegoating is characteristic of a psychological defense mechanism called "extre-punitivensee." The extra-punitive have a great deal of free-floating hate and aggression they project outward, blaming others or the world for their personal or social failures. Their view of the world is paranoid.

We tested for extra-punitiveness by asking what measures they would take against "Communists" and, in later questions, against other "safe" scapegoats (those with few defenders, such as delinquents, sex deviants, homosexuals, and "disrespectful persons"). Rightists were more in favor of strong measures against Communists (sample statement with high response: "Take them out and hang them"); but their generalized hostility showed up even more clearly in their attitudes toward nonpolitical deviants. (Sample statements: "There is hardly anything lower than a person who does not feel a great love, gratitude, and respect for his parents." "Homosexuals are hardly better than criminals and ought to be severly punished.")

Rightists not only condemn Communists but define them so differently that it is sometimes hard to believe they are talking about real people. There is a heavy emphasis on religion and black-or-white morality: To believe that we can live with Communism is to be a dupe or worse. Communism is the anti-Christ, it is evil incarnate. This allows for convenient projection of personal hatreds. Rightists often find the highly educated-including professors-to be Communists. "From what racial or ethnic groups are Communists most likely to come?"

Rightists frequently mentioned "atheists," "Jews," "Methodists," "Unitarians," and "modernistic religious groups." (Non - rightists denied more frequently and more vigorously that race or religion was involved.)

POWERLESSNESS. It is a basic tenet of rightism that individual freedom -as they define it-is being lost and that the ordinary citizen (meaning themselves) is being ignored. Is "the federal government...extending too much...power into..everyday life?" Nearly 70 percent of the rightists "agreed very much." "Are there any groups....that you think have too much power or influence?" "Yes," the rightists said, significantly more often than non-rightists, and listed labor (and its leaders), Communists, big government, and such groups as the ADA, ACLU, and Council on Foreign Relations. Who has too little power? They mentioned twice as many groups as the non - rightists, most often the two surrogates for themselves; the individual "common man" and "conservative " organizations.

Do rightists, as hypothesized, feel maligned and persecuted? They pointed out with considerable heat that their idealized "great men," with whom they identify, were mistreated; "Got a raw deal; treated badly by others, his country; a victim of injustice."

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

ALIENATION. We found our rightists to be signigicantly more alienated politically than the non-rightists, to feel that their elected public officials do not actually represent them, that local officials avoid or ignore them, responding only to special interests. On referenda on community issues - such as new bond issues or taxes-they more consistently than others vote "no."

Do they trust other people? (A person who feels lost, who has little sense of personal competence, often lives in a jungle of suspicion and distrust.) We found a significant association between radical rightism and low trust in others. Generally, the rightists in our sample were less often involved in social and community organizations.

Finally, the rightist feels that by joining other rightists he can overcome his own powerlessness and estrangement.

Extra-punitiveness, a paranoid view of society, a great deal of free-floating hostility and aggression, desire for direct action, a rigid devotion to absolutes in religion and morality and to black-or-white standards-all these characteristics describe particular kinds of closed-minded, insecure, authoritarian persons undergoing particular kinds of status crises. And that is who the radical rightists are.

A historical SKETCH

FROM 1946 TO THE PRESENT

RICHARD J. COUGHLIN

In reading reports about Vietnam today, I cannot help but be impressed by the enormous contrast between the country now and what it was like when I first went out to Saigon in 1946, some twenty years ago.

In 1946 I found a welcome, open, friendly people. Contacts were easy, confidence was mutual. I had many Vietnamese friends who trusted me, literally, with their lives. As an American I could do no wrong. All doors opened. This was a country even then at war-the Vietnamese against the French, and the issue was national independence - but to fly an American flag on our car and to post an American flag on our gate was all the protection we needed. The United States was then the great hope of the Vietnamese. We had been wartime allies in an underground against the Japanese, and it was expected that our wartime declarations about freedom of all colonial people would be honored.

Today we are in a war with the Vietnamese. Our daily papers give the gruesome boxscore of those killed, and no American is really safe in Saigon today or anywhere else in that unhappy country. A people we befriended, fought with, respected, admired, is now our bitter enemy. Those Vietnamese leaders like Ho Chi Minh whom we were glad to have with us during the war are now leading a nation in war against us.

What has happened in the past 20 years? Where did we go wrong?

MISREADING THE SIGNS

As a people and as a government we misread the signs that were there to see in Asia, and never more tragically than in the old French colony of Indochina. What were these signs in postwar Asia?

I. Freedom now. The period of domination of native peoples by Europeans was over. Ready or not, the former colonies wanted independence --not in a few years, but now; not limited freedom, but total, unreserved freedom. Freedom was not negotiable or conditional. Twenty years later it is difficult to capture or describe adequately the ferment and the demand for freedom in Asia, but in 1946 it was a living and powerful force like nothing anyone had seen in Asia before. To deny or to ignore this force was to court disaster.

2. The second sign was a bariation of the first. It read: No interference, no intervention. It was a sign that meant business--because any attempt to reestablish the old colonial order or any form of neo-colonialism was sure to rouse massive, determined resistance. After 80 years of colonial direction, the people wanted to be masters of their own country.

3. The third sign concerned native leaders. The leadership found in these former colonies by the end of the war had been selected and hardened by their wartime experience. At the end of the war with Japan, these leaders had won that most incredible of all prizes: freedom from colonial control. Sometimes this freedom lasted for only a very short time before colonial armies again took over, but for a time, people like the Vietnamese, the Cambodians, the Laotians, the Indonesians, the Burmese had tasted freedom and they would not forget. Without exception, the postwar leaders were national heroes, men to go down in history alongside the heroes of the past centuries. It did not matter what political belief a man had, or was said to have. It did not matter that Aung San of Burma was a Socialist or that Ho Chi Minh of Vietnam was a Communist or that Sukarno was Dutch-educated or that Nehru spoke English with a flawless British accent. The leaders, because they brought independence, were universally heroic, enshrined. The meaning of this sign was clear: unless you work with and through these leaders, you have no popular support for your goals. Unless your program is dedicated to preserving the independence and the unity of the nation, it will be rejected. If you insist on ignoring these signs, then you build your policy on fantasy.

4. The final sign as I saw it in postwar Asia was revolution. In the former colonies like Indochina the political but also the social and economic order was being abruptly rearranged. The European was out, the Asian was in and on top. Foreign concessions were to be nationalized, foreign institutions revamped, absentee landowning brought to an end, large estates distributed among the landless. Who was once up was now to be brought down, and those formerly of lowly position were to be given the highest seats of power and authority and influence.

THE AMERICAN FAILURE

These were the signs in postwar Asia. We have reached the present degree of tragedy in Vietnam because of our failure to read the signs, or our decision to ignore them.

Item One: We intervened on the side of the French from 1946 until the final French defeat in 1954 at Dien Bien Phu. The French could not have carried out that colonial war without our arms and supplies in an endless stream, without our money and credits, without our tacit, if unofficial, backing for a war against a Communist - led Viet Minh movement. We became a silent partner to the terror of the French-the sudden arrest, deportations, torture and executions. Not all Americans and not all government officials supported the French effort, but the arguments for backing France were strong enough to override any opposition. I think the typical reaction of our officials was not greatly different from that of an American Foreign Service officer I spoke to in Paris in 1948 on my way home, who after hearing about French military reverses in Indochina commented that what the French needed were more flame throwers---- a truly demoralizing weapon, he thought, that would shatter the will of the Vietnamese to fight.

Item Two: We lent our support, often more informal than formal but no less effective, to French efforts from 1946 onward to elevate certain cooperative Vietnamese as fictitious leaders of their people. The puppet governments that were formed did not really hurt the Viet Minh but they did serve to discredit Saigon governments and to waste political talent among the Vietnamese that might have been usefully employed in post Dien Bien Phu governments. We were a party to deception and deceit. And if Saigon governments are scorned today by the Vietnamese, we must share the blame.

Item Three: When the prolonged war did finally come to an end in 1954--with almost 200,00 French casualties and the decimation of the French officer group--our government was instrumental in finding and installing Ngo Dinh Diem as a so-called Vietnamese leader. We financed his government and armed his military, and then ignored its steady alienation of the Vietnamese people. Probably the most momentous decision of the Diem regime was not to hold the countrywide elections as specified in the 1954 Geneva Agreement--the war that we are involved in now can be traced directly to that decision, and we must take a large share of the responsibility for it. The Diem government was put up as an alternative to Communism--but it was neither honest, nor efficient, nor democratic, nor popular--although we pretended it was all these things until the day it was finally overthrown. If there is a healthy distrust of anti-Communism today in Vietnam, then we must share the blame. If there is a distrust of international negotiations and agreements and a distrust of our intentions, then we must acknowledge that this distrust is well-founded.

PAST IS PROLOGUE

All this, you may say, is water over the dam. What is done is done. But is it all past? Over the entrance to our National Archives in Washington is the penetrating observation: What is past is prologue. Or, as historians are prone to point out, those who do not learn from history are condemned to relive it. As we seem to be doing in Vietnam today.

Like the French before us, we have refused to acknowledge the existence of true, honest-to-god Vietnamese leaders but have insisted on creating paper premiers and generals. The generals who have headed a succession of Saigon governments since the fall of Diem can by no stretch of the imagination be called leaders of the Vietnamese, nor are they likely to become leaders.

A national leadership is not created by outsiders. Leaders arise from their people, more often than not by their opposition to outside pressures and demands, not by their willingness to cooperate with foreign pressures. And they remain leaders only so long as they act like nationalists, and they lose stature by being compliant.

We have brought massive military power to bear on a problem that is basically political and social and economic and religious. In a situation that is in my opinion susceptable to reason and negotiations, we have chosen to rely basically on military power. We have brought hundreds of thousands of foreign troops into a country where the presence of any foreign soldier is anathema. We persist in the belief that the more we destroy, the more we demoralize their communities, the readier they will be to deal with us, to accept our direction, to sit down and peacefully negotiate with us. Of all the misconceptions, this one is probably the most falacious and the most dangerous.

As in the past, we insist that the issue is communism, while to the rank and file Vietnamese it is a matter of nationalism. Nationalism and communism are so intertwined in Vietnam that they cannot be separated. If the national heroes like Ho Chi Minh are communist, then to destroy communism strikes at the very heart of Vietnamese nationalism. We have condemned ourselves to fight both nationalism and communism, which in Vietnam and elsewhere is an unbeatable combination.

To repeat, we do not seem to have learned from history, and in what Paul Mus calls the Second Indochinese War we are condemned to relive the mistakes and the tragedy of the First Indochinese War fought by the French until their final and disastrous defeat at Dien Bien Phu in 1954.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR PEACE

And what of the future? There have been three times in the past when we had the chance to resolve honorably the Vietnamese conflict:

I. At the end of World War II when Ho Chi Minh and his group appealed to Washington for support in their war for independence. We chose to ignore that appeal.

2. Again in 1954 following the defeat at Dien Bien Phu, when under terms of an international agreement Vietnam could have been made peaceful and stable. We chose to ignore that international agreement.

3. In November, 1963, when the Diem regime was finally overthrown by an aroused populace. We chose to support a military dictatorship in Saigon.

I think that we can look forward to, and deliberately plan for, a fourth opportunity, which may well be our last chance. An assembly in Saigon has been hammering out a new constitution which when put into effect can lead within a year to the formation in Saigon of a civilian government responsive to the needs and demands of Vietnam fro peace and stability. This government can be brought into existence and it can be encouraged to make whatever arrangements it wishes to achieve an end to the fighting and the creation of a coalition government in South Vietnam, which might then conduct negotiations with North Vietnam for the eventual unification of the nation.

Everyone with any authority or influence in the world has tried to resolve the Vietnamese problem: the Pope, the Secretary General of the United Nations, the President of France and the Prime Ministers of Britain, the Soviet Union, India, Cambodia and Canada--to say nothing of the role of Senator Robert F. Kennedy. But to no avail. I suggest that we try the Vietnamese people through a civilian government in Saigon.

At the Mobilization in New York, 175 men burned their draft cards. These men now urge you to make the same emphatic affirmation of freedom and life, in the face of conscription and murder.

Conscription is incompatible with democracy. We are convinced that conscription is clearly unconstitutional and, in the context of United States involvement in Vietnam, conscription is criminal.

The government of the United States has, through conscription, already oppressed or destroyed the lives and consciences of millions of Americans and Vietnamese. We have argued and demonstrated to stop this destruction. We have not yet succeeded. Powerful resistance is now demanded.

On May 17th, the Mobilization will send a delegation to Washington to confront the President. We join them in their pledge to "escalate resistance" if his response is unsatisfactory.

If you have contemplated the consequences and are prepared to undertake direct action, please contact us so that such action may be coordinated on a national scale.

interview; Sheinbaum

CIA

RAMPARTS

On March 4, 1967, Stanley Sheinbaum came to Nashville to speak on "The CIA, the University, and the War." This interview was recorded then. It is available on tape in the SSOC tape library for lending purposes.

THE MAGAZINE

NSS- Are Ramparts people heading the magazine in any specific direction: do they see it mainly as a muckraking journal or a political voice of the New Left or an attempt to make people think of the political and economic failures of this system or something else?

S- All three overlap. We don't like being called the political voice of the New Left because we're not quite sure what that is. One description is that we are muckrakers but on what we consider to be intellectual issues. Like what the Green Berets are doing: the brutalization of Americans, this kind of thing, aside from what the war is doing in Vietnam. The issue of the CIA: the implications for the closed society. We want to muckrake where we think it's critical. We want to muckrake on the foundations. I think we are non-ideological. I don't think there is an ideology afoot today that warrants the name. That's why I resist a little the "New Left" label.

NSS- Is Ramparts trying to develop an independent political network in California: You know the thing with the Scheer campaign...

S- And mine and Keating's...

NSS- "New Politics"...

S- It's related to it, obviously. It didn't start as a Ramparts movement. All three of us started independently and it's resulted in a "New Politics" phenomenon there that's a growing concern. It's not Ramparts started, but certainly Ramparts supported.

NSS- I read recently that the government was launching a campaign to destroy Ramparts by finding any ties that Ramparts has to "communists" and then red-baiting. Do you think that this is a serious possibility?

S- Yes. Carl Rowan, the Negro liberal journalist, has started this already. There was a column of his about a week ago.....Bob Scheer had gone to Prague right after the CIA break and Rowan suggested all sorts of things. Rowan said, "You've been in touch with the communist students there," and Scheer on the phone said, "No I haven't: I've been in touch with the NLF." But Rowan reported all this with a strong innuendo just this side of libel that we are communist controlled, we are communist financed, etc. That kind of thing we can expect: you know there will be all sorts of these, especially these liberal types who are very nervous about Ramparts. We expect a lot of red-baiting from them. But I have a funny hunch that the government is going to leave us alone. This is one way they make themselves look good. After all, we do something-The CIA thing with the NSA-and what happens? Here it is 2-3 weeks later and it's under the rug already. So what have they got to worry about? We're no threat.

THE INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT....

NSS- Do you feel that the job of exposing the work of the CIA and other arms of the invisible government in infiltrating and subverting the academic institutions of the U.S. is just beginning or is pretty well on its way to being completed?

S- Its just beginning. The CIA job ...that job alone is to the greater extent done. It's now open information. The real part is to do something about it. Not so much in terms of getting some legislative controls or something over CIA but to put second thoughts in the minds of a helluva lot of people who just go along: all these academicians who thought it was perfectly alright and don't question it. If we've accomplished that, then I think we've done a lot. But there is so much swept under the rug aside from the CIA phenomena.

NSS- Does any other branch of the invisible government play as important a part in this domestic undercover work as the CIA? I mean things like getting into the academic institutions.

S- Getting into the universities? They all do. The Defense Department, the Pentagon, Rand; they're all into the universities in heavy ways. The CIA is minor compared to what they do. In fact, half the budget of the University of California is Defense and AEC (Atomic Energy Commission).

AND THE UNIVERSITY

NSS- What departments and functions of the university do you think that these government institutions are most interested in penetrating?

S- The social sciences. There's an increasing awareness now on the part of the government that the hearts and minds of the people are what we have to get at. We're talking about social engineering. That's why this operation down in Columbia where the CIA was financing studies of what are the conditions necessary to bring about counter insurgency. What they're talking about is getting the social sciences to work in the cold war. They are starting to realize that this is far more important than the hardware, which is over in the physical sciences department.

NSS- Are there any ways that someone who did not have good inside knowledge of the specific university departments could investigate them and establish the fact of their involvement or noninvolvement with the secret power structure? For example, the work that you did at MSU-could that have been done by someone who was outside the dep't?

S- No. That's part of the problem. There should be some way of finding out what a department's contracts are, but you're not going to find out everything about a contract, because a contract is often a front. For instance the Michigan State thing was a contract with the AID program. Whose gonna suspect anything? I now make the assumption that almost any contract with any overseas operation, private or public, has some sort of a CIA tie. I can't establish anything, but I know enough to know that I am 90% right. Let me make a suggestion: if you want the best information about what's going on in this world read the Wall Street Journal and the U.S. News and World Report. There's more information in there about, you know, these kinds of things than you'll ever get in the New Republic or Ramparts or anywhere else. They seem to have access and they talk about it but they talk about it in a different context. The whole trouble is that you have to be alert in looking.

NSS- What would you estimate to be the CIA budget for one year?

S- We know fairly well that the budget for all intelligence activities is between $4 and $5 billion a year. The last figure that I saw for the CIA was $500 million, which I don't believe. I think its way over that: I think its closer to a billion. One interesting thing is happening in that ever since the Bay of Pigs the CIA has been a second class intelligence operation. The real work is being done more in the Defense Department. There's a thing called the DIA-The Defense Intelligence Agency-which I understand is about as big as the CIA now, and there's some sort of competition between them. I think the situation is worse as a result of that investigation after the Bay of Pigs.

WHO HAS CONTROL?

NSS- Does the CIA attempt its operations independently of control by other branches of the government or is it closely watched and directed?

S- Well theoretically it's closely watched but for example when the NSA thing broke they all expressed surprise. Later they said they knew about it, but they didn't do anything about it. So if they're watching they're not watching very carefully and they're not thinking about it. Humphrey is on the National Security Council that overseas this thing. He knew all about it.

NSS- Then it's pretty well known but they just sort of let is run.

S- This is the trouble: you slip into situations. This is why I think its important that what we've done is not that we're gonna bring about any new controls over the CIA -thats not gonna happen- but that the people in the universities, good thinking types, think twice about what the hell it is they're doing before they get involved. Really that's the most we can ask.

NSS- Is there any evidence to support the idea of direct links between the CIA and the highest levels of corporate power in the U.S.?

S- Well I think there are links. CIA is big government: big government is big corporations. You're implying something that services business somehow. I don't know. All I know is that the CIA is doing something that indirectly services business: it's maintaining the American position throughout the world.

NSS- Were the forces behind the founding of the CIA mostly economic or political?

S- Well, its a cold war operation. It started as such: it started out of the OSS during WWII, which was a legitimate intelligence operation. There's always a need for intelligence. I don't deny that any government wants to find out what it can from other governments. Part of the trouble with CIA is that its involved in operations around the world: what they call the dirty tricks dep't. You know, overthrowing governments, buying leaders abroad, this sort of thing. To too great an extent the CIA has become a cold war mechanism which means that its no longer intelligence gathering , it's policy creating and implementing. They're setting their own policy. They were setting a certain amount of policy in Vietnam. In fact this was a big problem in Vietnam: the American Ambassador didn't control things. The American military was pushing one way, the CIA was pushing another, Michigan State was pushing a third. But as long as you allow this kind of cold war attitude to dominate, then the cold war instruments per se become the power instruments. They are more instrumental in the cold war than the State Department.

THE ONE FUNCTION

NSS- What role do you think the CIA should play in the government?

S- Intelligence. Period. Strictly.

NSS- How can people work to insure that the CIA is limited to this function?

S- The people aren't interested. They're so caught up with the cold war themselves they don't see whats wrong with it. There was initial reaction the first week when the CIA-NSA thing broke- "My God, this is terrible, what they're doing to our innocent students." Now all the editorials, all the letters to the editor are in terms of "Well, you gotta do it, you're in a nasty difficult world. So you give kp things here and there." This is one of my major concerns: that there has been a subtle shift to the right in this country generally. And part of this shift comes from the cold war pre-occupation, comes from this attitude, "Well yeah you don't wanta give up these freedoms and these libertarian ideas and so forth but you got to."

NSS- How serious is the possibility that the CIA or some other branch of the government-the undercover government-can be used politically here at home to silence or buy off people who threaten the power structure? The example of everyone talking about, you know, who killed Malcom X? Do you think that its function can extend that far?

S- Well sure. I'd believe anything at this point. I don't know if its the CIA or the FBI or what. The killing of Malcom X is a story that I don't know if we're ever going to find out. The killing of Jack Kennedy is a story that has a lot of unanswered questions. I think that there is something of this sort about Malcolm X. I have no reason to believe it was CIA or anybody else but he was definitely considered a threat. The major problem of the whole left now is a leader: the lack of a leader. I also think, and this is my only optomistic note, that we're not headed for a Nazi type of reaction here. It's going to be much more subtle. We're gonna have all the trappings and lip service given to liberalism and free speech and an open society and all this. I don't think you'll have the storm troopers.

NSS- Can the CIA be changed without a major change in thinking by the powerful men in our political and economic circles?

S- Well you see I think anti-communism dominates everthing. If you are going to talk about a communist apparatus you gotta have your own apparatus. That's why the CIA becomes an operational mechanism as well as an intelligence gathering onw. And if it isn't the CIA, they shift a lot of it over to the Defense Dep't. As long as this anti-communist syndrome dominates everything the answer to that is no. You may change the CIA but it's going to pop up some other place. We know the country is full of institutes that are cold war oriented.

NSS- Then the CIA couldn't really be changed unless a very, very broad spectrum of other things were changed.

S- It's not a matter of changing CIA, it's a matter of changing attitudes. Going back to Ramparts, that's where we're at. That's what we're after, is to affect attitudes. To get some sense that there's something wrong with the thing that CIA is doing.

I
AMERICAN LABOR: a review

Don Boner

For a revealing picture of labor's shameful role in the "holy war against communism" read "The CIA and American Labor -- the Subversion of the AFL - CIO's Foreign Policy", by George Morris. (Int'l Publishers, New World Paperbacks, 381 Park Ave. S, N.Y. 10010, April 1967, $1.25).

The book presents some good labor movement history and depicts the rise of today's labor leaders (including Lovestone, Dubinski, Meany, Green and Gompers), and the roots of labor's current support of the Cold War.

Particularly significant are the chapters on how the anti-communist theory developed in American labor since 1917, and the forms of collaboration with capitalists through yellow dog contracts and company unions. The author describes the AFL fight against the rising industrial unionism of the CIO in the 30's.

He traces the course of the National Civic Federation, a labor-business coalition formed after 1900 which, in the 1930's worked to present a favorable impression of Hitler's new Germany. He describes the collaboration of Matthew Woll, John L. Lewis, and others with J. Edgar Hoover in encouraging Hitler to invade and conquer the Soviet Union and how this coincided with a rise in anti-Semetic feeling within the AFL.

Woll became a close associate of Dave Dubinski of the International Ladies Garment Workers who brought Woll into the International Affairs Dep't of the AFL. Woll developed a network of anti-communist spies all across Europe some time before the CIA was formed. After WWII, this spy network fell right into the plans of the new CIA. Morris vividly describes labor's role in aiding the overthrow of a left - wing government in Honduros and how, later, the AFL - CIO supported the abortive Bay of Pigs invasion during the Kennedy administration.

The author tells how "The Federationist", the AFL magazine, has been used to support the policies of collaboration and trade union capitalism. Particularly offensive was the use of the magazine at the height of McCarthyism and the Korean War when editor William Green campaigned in support of using the Smith Act to jail communists across the country.

Concerning the recent period, Morris is more hopeful. He describes Walter Reuther's increasing disgust at the AFL-CIO's involvement in international sabotage. The explosion finally came late in 1966 when, without authorization of the AFL-CIO executive committee, President George Meany boycotted the meeting of the International Labor Organization, after a Polish delegate was elected chairman. This was the prelude to Reuther's resignation from the executive committee.

The more positive side of the labor movement today comes out at the end of the book, discussing increased union support of the anti - war movement, Reuther's new platform, and growing rank -and- file dissent against the established labor bureaucracy.

MISSISSIPPI STUDENT REVOLTS
Special from Dave Doggett

Wednesday night (May 10) the Jackson soul station started giving news bulletins about a demonstration at Jackson State College so Don Cole, my roomate, and I went over to see what was happenin'. When we got there about 300 students and street kids were sitting around the middle of Lynch street, a thoroughfare which runs thru the campus. Police had blocked off the campus with barriers. I found a friend of mine who goes to JSC and here's what he said:

The day before some white guys had sped down Lynch yelling and throwing bricks and they hit one guy and sent him to the infirmary - this of course got everyone pissed off. Then Wednesday night they had student body election speeches, and the girls couldn't get out of the dorms so they had the speeches in front of the girls dorms, which are on Lynch. Right after everybody had left the speeches, two Negro police chased a student for speeding. The student got into his dorm room and the fuzz went in after him and tried to take him out of his room but other students wouldn't let the heat get him. So then everybody who had been at the speeches come back out and the candidates started holding forth about the incident and everybody went out in the street and blocked traffic. Then the police came out in force and put up barriers in the street. Meanwhile the Tougaloo students heard about it on the radio and they commandeered a bus and came to help out. Howard Spencer got there about 12 o' clock and we started feeling very white so we left. After we left they built a bonfire and burned some of the police barriers.

The next day the police took down the barriers and let traffic come through again. It wasn't long before another carload of white kids sped through again yelling and throwing stuff, and this time people threw back. The police came out in force again and put the barriers back up. Things got progressively worse, and people started throwing at the police. They built another bonfire and burned some more saw horses. Then some cop got hit in the head and the police opened fire. Benjamin Brown caught a shotgun blast in the back and died later that night. Two other people got shot but neither wound was fatal. Right after this the national guard, which was standing by, moved in and maintained a curfew.

That night I got in touch with a few people at Millsaps, and we decided to have a protest march against the murder. Friday morning we printed up some leaflets and made some placards and talked everybody we could into marching. At 3 o'clock 22 white Millsaps students marched down the main streets of town, marched around city hall three times and marched back to Millsaps. The variety of participants in the march was amazing. Several of the guys were in fraternities. Right before we got downtown the president of next year's senior class, who had been following in a car and who is a guard on the football team, got out of the car, came to the head of the line, asked me for my sign, and led the march for the rest of the way. A frat rat who is a brown belt karate came up to the front with him and they made sure nobody messed with us. The whole thing was fantastically ironic because two motorcycle cops gave us beautiful protection and the whole purpose of the march was to protest police brutality.

Meanwhile, down at Mississippi Southern University in Hattiesburg (a white, state school) there were two nights of revolt. It started out as a panty raid and got worse when it turned into a protest against the administration. People threw rocks at the police (of course nobody got shot though) and the students captured a power station and shut down half the campus. The president of Southern is an old military man and runs the campus accordingly. The students were protesting against clothing and conduct regulations, cafeteria food, faculty dismissals, and publications censorship. The president has agreed to meet with the student leaders and work things out. We know some of the leaders of the protest, but we don't have time to go down and see them-we will try to correspond with them.

NASHVILLE

Mike Zagarell, National Youth Director of the Communist Party U.S.A. visited Nashville on May I6-I7 and spoke at Vanderbilt University. He was sponsored by the Vanderbilt Committee for Alternatives to War in Vietnam, the New Marxist Study Group, the Student Political Education and Action Committee and SSOC. About I500 persons were present to hear Zagarell speak on "Communism and American Democracy". At least II00 of these remained after a group of approximately 400 waving American flags exited in the middle of the speech. While in Nashville, Zagarell held two press conferences and was trailed about by police, reporters and various unidentified persons.

As soon as the Nashville Banner began its usual red-baiting on the basis of Zagarell's speaking engagement at Vanderbilt, strange things began to occur at the SSOC house. The night of a poster party preparing for the speech, three husky strangers showed up at the house claiming that they were baseball players in town for a game. They said they had been told they might find free lodging overnight at the SSOC house, but since they were consuming large quantities of beer and asking suspicious questions they were cast (politely) into the street and told there was "no more room at the inn". About I:30 A.M. that night (May I0) they returned cursing and throwing beer bottles and broke out several windows, including the large front window which was shattered by a cement block. When the police were called, they took a comfortable I5 minutes to arrive although they had been waiting around the corner earlier for a chance to move in. Strangely enough, no report was filed on the incident. The next night (May II) a station wagon pulled up across the street and about eight belligerent guys got out and started towards the house. This time the police were called before anything got started and a report was made. However, there was no real action to report except a stick thrown against a window. Since this time there have been several bomb threats, so if all reports from the SSOC house suddenly cease use your imagination.

VIETNAM SUMMER

Vietnam Summer is an accelerated attempt to broaden the constituency of the anti-war movement. Unlike the Mississippi Summer, this project anticipates that people will stay and work in their own or their college communities. What this means for SSOC is that rather than hosting an influx of Northern missionaries, we will very likely be able to receive financial assistance to help Southern Students work in Southern communities. Projects and activities will of course vary with each volunteer and with each community. Suggested areas of concentration include: (I) draft counselling and draft resistance work,

(2) assistance in the formation of local anti-war committees, (3) helping make available Peace and Draft literature, (4) films and speakers, (5) research into the discriminatory composition of the local draft board, (6) and exposure of the university's involvement with the war machinery. Althoug lagging far behind the national percentage, South ern opposition to the war and the draft has been growing. This summer, it is imperative that we further build and increase the power and visibility of that opposition. Vietnam Summer will likely be coordinated in the South by SSOC and Operation Open Debate of SCEF in cooperation with other groups such as AFSC and local committees. The Vietnam Summer budget provides tentatively for $25 a week salaries for summer workers. If you would like to work this summer to build the base of the Southern anti - war movement, let us know immediately:
Where would you like to work?
When can you start working?
When would you stop?
What would you like to do in the community?
Can you raise money locally or work without salary?
Local chapters should discuss ideas for summer vietnam programs and keep the SSOC office posted on what you plan to do. If you are interested and want to recieve further information, write "Vietnam Summer", c/o SSOC, Box 6403, Nashville, Tenn, 37212. (Please write even if you signed the list at the convention.) Tom Gardner, SSOC chairman, is coordinating Vietnam Summer in the South. He is now in Cambridge where he has the use of a WATS line to make contacts. We should be recieving materials for a mailing shortly. Ben Ragsdale will be travelling in Virginia, David Doggett is working in Mississippi, and Alan (Nik) Levin is the contact for Florida. ## VIETNAM SUMMER 1967

The Vietnam Summer Project is a concerted national effort to reach out to the silent Americans who are growing more and more worried about the Administration's war in Vietnam.

VIETNAM SUMMER WILL BE thousands of people in neighborhoods all across the country stimulating discussion, debate, education, and action.

VIETNAM SUMMER WILL INVOLVE students, workers, professionals, housewives, clergy, and all others who oppose the war.

VIETNAM SUMMER WILL ORGANIZE petition drives, grass-roots congressional hearings, draft opposition, and referenda on the war.

VIETNAM SUMMER WILL BUILD a movement to release the voice of the American people.

IT CAN bring peace to the people of Vietnam.

Vietnam Summer, like the Mississippi Summer Project of 1964, needs thousands of student volunteers to make the project a success. Unlike the Mississippi Summer, however, this project anticipates that students will stay and work in their home or university communities. Vietnam Summer embraces a variety of people who are interested in several different projects. These range from broad, electorally-oriented educational projects aimed at middle-class adults to draft opposition. What all of these activities share in common is a sense that the anti-war movement must deepen and broaden its organizing work dramatically this summer. Vietnam Summer will train organizers, develop educational materials, and provide funds for many types of activities, including:

COMMUNITY TEACH-OUTS. Starting with door-to-door canvassing to identify those with doubts about the war, "teach-outs" proceed to neighborhood educational meetings and seminars. When a group is ready for action, possibilities include petition campaigns; public referenda on the war; leafletting campaigns in public places; resolutions against the war by local Democratic and Republican committees; candidates in 1967 municipal elections; community speak-outs and panel discussions on the war; consumer boycotts of companies directly involved in war production; sending medical and other aid to civilian victims of the war.

ORGANIZING PROJECTS in Poor and Working Class Communities. Vietnam Summer will work with unions and community organizations that want to begin anti-war education and action programs. Vietnam Summer will also undertake extensive work in black ghettoes around issues related to the war.

DRAFT OPPOSITION. Vietnam Summer will provide an opportunity for work by the increasing number of students who have conscientiously questioned the war. Organizers will locate young people opposed to the war in various communities and set up education and action programs around issues of the draft and the war.

VIETNAM SUMMER NEEDS:

- Ten thousand volunteer organizers to work part-time in 500 communities across the country. They will be the heart of the program. Volunteer organizers will go door to door, and organize meetings and action projects.
- One thousand full-time organizers to spearhead local programs. Subsistence support will be available for some of these organizers. Community groups will also seek out local residents willing to provide room and board. Some organizers will find jobs in factories, stores, etc., where they can organize among fellow workers.
- 200 experienced Field Secretaries to take major responsibility for helping local projects. Field Secretaries will receive subsistence plus travel expenses as needed.

If you live in an area where there is no Vietnam Summer project, you can organize one. Form a group with others in your community who oppose the war, and set up your own VIETNAM SUMMER project. If you need help in setting up the project, raising funds, recruiting staff, etc., contact the national headquarters in Cambridge, Mass. The national office can also supply you with the names of key contacts and projects in your areas, with literature and projects kits. Limited staff and funds will be available to local projects.

Send the application on the reverse side to the national office of VIETNAM SUMMER, 129 Mt. Auburn Street, Cambridge, Mass. 02138. Tel. 617-492-6700.

Dear Friends:

A new generation of Negro leaders is one of the fruits of the civil rights struggle of the sixties. Through SEDFRE's Eleanor Roosevelt Scholarship Program, we have singled out some of the most promising of these developing leaders for help in obtaining higher education.

James Reed and Joyce Amos are typical of this generation. Under duress they have shown stunning gifts of leadership. Their family incomes do not even provide subsistence, but they are determined to attend college and to achieve their dreams for a better society.

James Reed just completed his first year at Tougaloo College. But he is one of eleven children of a Greenwood, Mississippi family and he will be forced to drop out if aid is not found for next year.

Since he turned 15 in 1963, young Reed has been active in every phase of civil rights work. Every day after school and after working the cotton fields to help support his family, he joined other workers in door-to-door canvases, often in dangerous plantation areas. He talked with people about their lives and about the need to vote and about equal rights never acknowledged in Mississippi. Often he went out on his own to have a heart-to-heart talk with the Negro farmers about their problems. Twice he received jail sentences, stinging rebuffs to his courage.

His dedication and his capacity for work impressed his fellow workers. He was selected for an Upward Bound program. One supporter puts the case for Mr. Reed succinctly: "His strength of character, courage and desire can be multiplied many times if he is allowed to continue in college".

Joyce Marie Amos of Jonesboro, Louisiana, has been accepted at Northeastern State College, a recently integrated college in her state. During a successful high school boycott for better education in 1965, she led the students, picketed, marched and as a member of the student executive council negotiated with the school board.

She reports, in an off-hand way, that on her way home from a demonstration, "a white gentleman hit me with his car and I was forced onto his hood. He drove me around the city for about 20 blocks at speeds up to 65 m.p.h."

Miss Amos is not off-hand about her ambition: "I hope to aid the Negroes in my state who are illiterate and those who aren't registered because my state is very lowly rated in these areas".

Presently available SEDFRE funds are committed to the continuing education of 50 Eleanor Roosevelt Scholars now attending colleges and universities. Additional money is needed immediately to start these and other highly qualified applicants on their way up in September.

We share with these young leaders responsibility for the quality of the American future. Their potential contribution depends directly on our financial support at this moment in their lives. Each student requires approximately $1,000 a year, this means $500 each semester. We have many outstanding applicants, and your reply today will help determine how many students receive Eleanor Roosevelt Scholarships this fall.

Marvin Rich

BACKGROUND MEMO ON FORMER GOVERNOR JAMES PLEMON COLEMAN OF ACKERMAN, MISSISSIPPI, NOMINATED ON FRIDAY, JUNE 18, 1965 BY PRESIDENT JOHNSON TO BE A JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

President Johnson's appointment of Former Governor James Plemon Coleman of Mississippi as a judge of the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals seems most regrettable. Throughout his long career as a public official Coleman has held virtually every type of office in the state of Mississippi. Coleman has voiced and shown by his action his commitment to white supremacy based upon race and color. Mr. Coleman stands out as the architect of much, if not most, of Mississippi's defenses against desegregation and equal rights for all her citizens.

The fact that there is not a single Federal judge in the state of Mississippi - nor indeed any federal judicial official - who is Negro appears as a shocking background to the Presidential appointment of Mr. Coleman. Moreover, the fact that there is no federal judge, either in the District Courts or in the Court of Appeals, in the entire Fifth Circuit who is Negro is of even further concern. (Southern Regional Council 1965 Special Report on the Southern Judiciary.)

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals is responsible for rendering final decisions (subject only to limited Supreme Court review) and for reviewing and guiding the course and timing of most of the civil rights litigation in the United States. The Fifth Circuit also encompasses the two worst states in the nation in terms of denial of civil rights - Mississippi and Alabama.

Following this opening note and preceeding the detailed materials, there appears a brief collection of some of the most pointed items concerning Mr. Coleman. These materials are in chronological order and were gathered from an incomplete reading of the Jackson, Mississippi, Clarion-Ledger. The Clarion-Ledger is the largest newspaper in the state and is designated by the Legislature for official state notices and publications.

This memo is by no means exhaustive of Mr. Coleman's background in regard to his human rights position.

PRECIS OF MEMO ON J. P. COLEMAN

August 7, 1955

p. 12

(Re: School desegregation)

"In my opinion," he said, "this issue which has been forced upon us will be settled one way or the other in 16 months or two years... and based on the studies I have made and the experience I have had fighting integration attempts I can say without hesitation that if I am elected Governor the schools of Mississippi will never be integrated nor will they be closed."

January 3, 1956

(Note: Following are excerpts from Coleman's Inaugural Address as Governor.)

p. 6

I come now to a discussion of ...the continued separation of the white and Negro races in accordance with those customs which the experience of ninety years has taught us all, white and colored alike, to be for the welfare of all concerned.

My own personal and official attitude toward this question is well known to all Mississippians. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1955 I said in my official platform: 'There will be no mixing of the races in any of the state operated educational institutions. I already have a record on this subject. This is no task for the amateur or the hothead.'"

I further told the people that if elected governor, with the cooperation of a good legislature, we would maintain the separation of the races WITHOUT AT THE SAME TIME KEEPING OUR STATE, ITS ECONOMY, ITS CUSTOMS, AND ITS PRACTICES, IN A DAILY UPROAR OF CONFUSION AND UNCERTAINTY. I say to this audience and to those who are listening by radio and television that I have not the slightest fear that four years hence when my successor stands on this same spot to assume his official oath, the separation of the races will be left intact and will still be in full force and effect in exacty (sic) the same manner and form as we know it today."

October 26, 1956

p. 29

Coleman said recently, "I do not now favor the Negro voting in Mississippi. He is wholly unprepared to assume this responsibility."

Coleman said further that he does not favor Negroes voting in this state and that he hopes that there will never be a strong Republican Party in Mississippi. "The reasons that the Negro should not vote in that state are obvious," he said. "If they vote in numbers, they will vote as a block, and you will see politicians playing up to them as in the Northern states now."

November 19, 1957

Governor Coleman also warned of the expanding Negro vote in the state and suggested constitutional revision to cope with this threat.

He declared circuit clerks who now act as registrars, not being lawyers, could be intimidated into allowing "wholesale voting of unqualified voters" - obviously Negroes - under the Civil Rights Act. He proposed three-man registrar boards, with one member a lawyer, but did not say how they would operate.

November 21, 1958

Governor J.P. Coleman promised Thursday that Mississippi would maintain segregation despite the efforts of his political enemies who agitate "to improve their political chances."

". . . We are going to keep the schools in Mississippi open, and we are going to operate them on a segregated basis."

June 30, 1959

(Note: The following is taken from a television speech by Coleman.)

"I am well aware that a little handful of my political adversaries have tried to destory my place in the affections of my fellow Mississipians by claiming that I am a "moderate." Apparently, these people cannot tell a moderate from a successful segregationist. They have made a great sham of this, and every time they can get a chance they tri to stir it up. I ask you to ignore what they say and look at what the record says . . . I stand on a record of performance and I have delivered the goods. I am not entitled to be called a moderate, and I notice that non of my friends have called me that."

Former Governor J. P. Coleman Thursday night promised there will be no racial integration of public schools in Mississippi during the next four years if he gets a second term in the governor's office.

"There will be no necessity to abolish the public schools," he promised again Thursday. "Nor will there be any mixing of the races in any of the state-operated educational institutions. This is no task for the amateur or the hothead."

July 10, 1963

Former Governor J. P. Coleman said Tuesday his opponents have taken a defeatist attitude on the race issue. Speaking at Monticello, Morgantown, and McComb, Coleman said he is the only candidate "with hope of stemming widespread integration and the ability and experience to do it. My opponents say that I cannot stop it," he declared, "because they have apparently lost hope and have offered no plan or suggestion for maintaining separation of the races."

p. 1

Attorney General J.P. Coleman told a television audience here Tuesday night that the Congress of the United States never intended that the 14th amendment to the Constitution be used as applicable to public schools. He declared further that Mississippi will maintain segregation in the schools, regardless of the U.S. Supreme Court.

p. 16

Coleman said that there is plenty that the sovereign states can do to counteract the Supreme Court decision. "Separate education for the races can be maintained in Mississippi," he declared solemnly.

June 3, 1954

(Note: This story reports Governor White's calling a meeting of his Legal Advisory Committee on Education. J.P. Coleman, according to The Clarion-Ledger, besides being a regular member of this committee, also served on two sub-committees, the planning and statutory committee and the resolutions committee. The following policy statement was issued by the committee:)

p. 1

"The committee conceives its duty to be to devise the means and methods by which separate schools for the races shall be maintained in that state and to submit such plan to the Legislature for its action thereon."

(Note: The following statement concerns the committee's view on school desegregation.)

p. 14

The committee was unanimous in its opinion that Mississippi should not attempt to work with the Supreme Court, as the states have been invited to do, to solve the integration problem.

May 11, 1955

(Note: The Clarion Ledger reported the following story concerning the opening of Coleman's campaign for Governor. The speech quoted was made at Ackerman, Mississippi, Coleman's hometown.)

p. 3

Coleman set forth that he is the only candidate officially facing up to the court and called to attention his move enlisting all attorneys to provide legal aid against desegregation.

May 11, 1955 (con't)

"when you go to the polls on August 2, you ballot most certainly will determine the education of your children and the maintenance of segregation for the next four years, possibly for the next 50 years," he said.

"I have said that those who propose to mix the races in our public schools had might as well try to dip the Atlantic dry with a teaspoon."

"I here and now give the people of Mississippi my solemn pledge that if I am elected governor there will be no necessity to abolish the public schools, nor will there be any mixing of the races in those schools," Coleman declared.

J. P. Coleman, the third candidate to speak, cited his experience in defending the segregation laws of Mississippi, and declared that so long as he is governor,"no Negro will ever enter the white schools of this state."

p. 12

Attorney General Coleman said that "In this segregation issue, we are put on notice that the Supreme Court proposes to change the South's social face rather than its legal face.

Coleman said that the issue has been brought on us by the courts "and we must resist in the courts."

"We have already planned our strategy. First, we will stand on the provisions of our state constitution. When the U.S. Supreme Court strikes that down, then we will start assignments under the Gore Act, which is perfectly constitutional law. Should that fail, we can adopt a school on the local option plan, get it out of the clutches of the Federal Courts, and immediately re-establish it with a new set of trustees."

Earlier today at Bruce, Coleman said that he believes that the assignment bill adopted by the Mississippi Legislature, known as the Gore Bill, will take care of the segregation problem for 25 years to come.

Candidate Coleman charged that no other candidate in the race for governor has the experience to combat the integration attempts which will be forthcoming in this state.

(Subject: School desegregation)

"In my opinion this issue which has been forced upon us will be settled one way or the other in 16 months of two years. . . and based on the studies I have made and the experience I have had fighting integration attempts I can say without hesitation that if I am elected governor the schools of Mississippi will never be integrated nor will they be closed."

August 13, 1955

Coleman also spent considerable time reviewing his record as an opponent of racial segregation.

"Where was my distinguished opponent in 1951?" Coleman asked rhetorically, "When I stood alone before a hostile U.S. Supreme Court and showed those Communist lawyers they could not fool . . . with the great state of Mississippi." He repeated his account of how he interrupted his campaign during the first primary to drive all night to Vicksburg and dispose of a petition by Negroes there to integrate the schools.

"I handled that situation in less than twelve hours," he declared. "It was the shortest integration attempt in the history of the South."

The Committee, upon the recommendation of Coleman, voted to ask the legislators to:

September 22, 1955 (con't)

1. Abolish common-law marriages by statute.

2. Enact laws penalizing champerty and the stirring up of litigation against the state and any of its sub-divisions and against unauthorized practices of law in this state by any attorneys from outside.

3. Enact statutes penalizing person who use abusive language over the telephone.

4. Effect laws giving the state authority to arrest the officers of the Federal Bureau of Identification (sic) for interfering with the rights of individuals in this state.

5. Authorize creation of a council for the maintenance of segregation.

6. Authorize the secretary to the Legal Education Advisory Committee to form liaison (sic) between southern states as an interstate commission to fight integration.

7. Repeal the compulsory school attendance act.

(Note: The statement referred to below was by U. S. Attorney General Brownell who called for investigation of Negro voting in the recent Mississippi primary.)

"I think Mississippi is perfectly capable of conducting its own elections without any assistance from the NAACP or its sympathisers."

Coleman said he hadn't read the statement but that he knew of "no violation of anybody's civil rights in connection with Mississippi's primary."

p. 9

Attorney General J. P. Coleman, as the next governor of Mississippi, will recommend to the 1956 legislature that the common-law marriage in the state be outlawed. The action would be directed toward continuing of segregation in the schools of the state and would be a part of several facets of the overall state plan to defeat efforts of the NAACP and the Supreme Court of the United States to break down racial discrimination.

Governor-Elect J. P. Coleman declared that he agrees with former Governor Fielding Wright's suggestion that Mississippi join with Virginia in seeking a constitutional amendment on the preservation of state's rights and segregation.

"Let there be no misunderstanding. I am for segregation. Mississippi will never integrate. I told the people last summer that we would preserve segregation and that it would be done by lawful means. The people in Mississippi approved my position by a resounding majority.

"I come now to a discussion of that governmental question which continuously for months has been uppermost in the minds of the people of Mississippi and which no doubt is destined to vex and harass us in the years immediately ahead. I refer to maintaining the continued separation of the white and Negro races in accordance with those customs which the experience of ninety years has taught us all, white and colored alike, to be for the welfare of all concerned."

"My own personal and official attitude toward this question is well known to all Mississippians. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1955 I said in my official platform:'There will be no necessity to abolish public schools, nor will there be any mixing of the races in any of the state operated educational institutions. I already have a record on this subject. This is no task for the amateur or the hothead.'"

"This position was given overwhelming support of the people of Mississippi at the ballot boxes last August."

"I further told the people that if elected governor, with the cooperation of a good Legislature, we would maintain the separation of the races WITHOUT AT THE SAME TIME KEEPING OUR STATE, ITS ECONOMY, ITS CUSTOMS, AND ITS PRACTICES IN A DAILY UPROAR OF CONFUSION AND UNCERTAINTY. I say to this audience and to those who are listening by radio and television that I have not the slightest fear that four years hence when my successor stands on this ame spot to assume his official oath, the separation of the races will be left intact and will still be in full force and effect in exacty (sic) the same manner and form as we know it today."

Governors of four southern states, including Mississippi's James Plemon Coleman, will sit down for a round-table discussion of educational and segregation problems at Richmond, Virginia Tuesday.

He said that the whole purpose of the meeting of governors, whose state legislatures are now all in session, is to unify and to correlate their efforts toward maintaining segregation in the schools of the South.

January 23, 1956

RICHMOND, Va., Jan. 24 (AP) - Four southern governors tonight agreed to seek joint action by their states to protest and appeal the Supreme Court decision throwing out school segregation.

They also agreed to take whatever individual state action by legislative means they deemed necessary to prevent mixing the races in their public schools.

The decision was announced at the end of a six-hour conference among Governors Thomas B. Stanley, Virginia; George Bell Timmerman, Jr., South Carolina; J. P. Coleman, Mississippi; and Marvin Griffin, Georgia.

p. 3

Timmerman read this statement at the close of the session:

"This conference, composed of the governors of the four Southern states whose legislatures are in regular session does declare:

"That the states have not delegated to the federal government or any agency thereof the power to prohibit the segregation of the races in the public schools and we, therefore, shall recommend to the legislatures of our respective states that the following action be taken:

"1. That there be adopted a resolution of interposition of protest in appropriate language against the encroachment of the central government upon the sovereignty of the several states and their people.

2. That a call be made upon the Congress of the United States to take such action within the limits of its constitutional authority as to protect the states and her people against present and future encroachment by the central government.

"3. That each state exercise its right to enact and utilize such other appropriate legal measures as it may deem advisable to protect its sovereignty and the rights of its people."

January 27, 1956

Governor J.P. Coleman just returned from a conference of Southern governors, said here Thursday that he will support any move toward the exercise of interposition to maintain segregation in the South and in this state.

He said that while there are no such legal terms as interposition or nullification, that he has never objected to the use of the term interposition and that we will support it in the terms he understands are implied.

Interposition, he explained, is a stand interposing rights of the people of the use of every legal means by the state to protest the rights of the state against an "unconstitutional edict of the U.S. Supreme Court."

Coleman said the governors of Virginia, Georgia and South Carolina agreed with him that they should let the nation know "In no uncertain terms that the Supreme Court ban on segregation is unconstitutional and that we will oppose it with every legal means available."

Professors in state-owned and operated institutions of Higher Learning who wish to act as a sounding board for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are not wanted, Governor J.P. Coleman told newsmen here Tuesday.

The state's chief executive thus backed up the Mississippi legislature in its resolutions of "good riddance" of two college officials, Morton King, of the University of Miss. and William Buchanan, of Miss. State College, both of whom have resigned in protest against screening of speakers in the two institutions.

"they just staged a sympathy strike on behalf of the Rev. Alvin Kershaw, whom Ole Miss barred after he announced he belonged to the NAACP," Coleman declared.

Coleman told newsmen that "I worked hard to get Kershaw here, and then he wrote the silliest letter I ever read, announcing his NAACP stand."

February 15, 1956 (cont'd)

"I really don't believe Kershaw wrote the letter he sent us," Coleman said. "It reads like it was NAACP-inspired."

Governor Coleman reminded his audience that the University of Mississippi and Mississippi State College are state-owned.

"They belong to the people, and the people of Mississippi have the right to demand that teachers expounding against our way of life be ousted," he said.

Governor J. P. Coleman declared Tuesday that if a Negro succeeds in entering any institution of higher learning or any common school in Mississippi, the seat of learning would be immediately abolished.

Governor J. P. Coleman signed a bill repealing the compulsory school attendance laws -- a move to protect the state integration cases.

The bill was proposed by the Legal Education Advisory Committee, set up to find ways to evade the U. S. Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in schools. Members argued last year that the state would have firmer legal standing in integration cases if it did not require children - Negro and white - to attend school.

Governor J. P. Coleman revealed here late Thursday that he has turned down speaking engagement on the segregation issue in at least six states, including Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York.

He gave as his reason the fact that he does not believe the governor of Mississippi should be attempting to influence the people of another state on any issue.

"That is just what we are objecting to in Mississippi," he said. "We don't want outsiders coming in and telling us waht to do. By the same token, I don't propose to be going to other states for such a purpose. Anyway, why discuss a proposition on which we permit no argument."

The 12-member Mississippi State Sovereignty commission, created to protect states' rights from Federal "encroachment," organized behind closed doors Wednesday and prepared to hire a full-time staff.

Governor J. P. Coleman, who advocated open meetings of all state organizations during his campaign last summer, barred the press from the meeting, saying he would issue a statement later.

He was automatically named chairman of the group and chairman of a subcommittee to select an "outstanding attorney with wide federal court experience" to work with the attorney general in fighting court cases attacking the sovereignty of Mississippi.

The SCC, empowered to resist any Federal laws of court decisions contrary to Mississippi law and tradition, was created to replace the disbanded Legal Education Advisory Committee, itself set up to seek means of evading the U. S. Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation.

The Governor of Mississippi Sunday called the defeat of the two North Carolina Congressmen, a warning to the Democratic party not to "insult the South's convictions."

Governor J. P. Coleman issued a statement about the defeat of U. S. Representatives Thurmond D. Chatham and Charles B. Deane, both North Carolina Democrats who refused to sign the Southern Manifesto which pledged 101 southern lawmakers to resist the school segregation decision of the U. S. Supreme Court. The Congressmen were defeated for re-nomination in North Carolina's Democratic primary voting yesterday. Coleman, a life-long Democrat who helped keep Mississippi in the party in 1952, said: "The action of the voters in a moderate state like North Carolina in defeating two members of Congress because of their refusal to sign the Southern Manifesto should be notice to certain figures in the Democratic party that the South has no intention of submitting to an unconstitutional Supreme Court decision" (on segregation.)

On the really important points, they stood together, including strong resolutions on segregation and states' rights, an uninstructed, unit-rule delegation, a recessed convention subject to recall after the national conventions, and freedom of states' righters to express their views and yet remain in the party fold.

As expected, Governor Coleman held a majority in the convention.

Governor J. P. Coleman said here late today that he does not anticipate any attempts to integrate the common schools of this state "now or at any time in the foreseeable future."

"Our firm policy of state government which has the backing of all of our people will forestall that," he said.

Coleman also reminded his audience that the school abolition act of 1954 which would allow the states to transfer the school to private status is also a deterrent to any attempts at integration.

"Our Negro leaders know that to attempt to integrate would only cause their children to lose out on schooling altogether," the chief executive of Mississippi said.

"We will have segregation in Mississippi so long as our people want it," Coleman declared. He said that Mississippi has many ways of defending itself against any attempts at integration, but that he would not reveal them until such time as needed to be put into effect.

Governor J. P. Coleman Sunday told 20 visiting New England editors and publishers that Mississippi will keep racial segregation"for at least the next 50 years."

Coleman said, "That doesn't mean I think it will end then; I just don't think I can speak for the period beyond that."

"As far as I am concerned, there will (be) no integration in Mississippi. I don't say that boastfully, but because it is for the best interest of the state."

The journalists are guests of the State Sovereignty Commission which was created by the 1956 legislature to preserve Mississippi's states'-rights--- primarily segregation.

Holding that Mississippi is the only Southern state that still retains 100 percent segregation, Coleman also attacked states' righters for attempting to make integration a campaign issue.

"They are picking flaws in perfection," the governor declared "We haven't had one school integrated; yet, they cry integration Democrats in Mississippi have enacted integration laws as regards our schools that no States Righter has been able to improve upon or even suggest an improvement (sic)." Coleman declared What can the States Righters find wrong with the 100 percent segregation now in effect in this state? Coleman asked.

(Attorney General Herbert) Brownell has summoned U. S. attorneys of 14 Southern states to appear in Washington on December 10 to map plans of action for enforcing desegregation on busses and other public carriers.

Late Monday afternoon, no action had been taken by the State Sovereignty Commission toward an early meeting to cope with the new problems. Hal DeCell, publicity director, said that his office had received no notice of the Brownell action. The Sovereignty Commission, created to keep Mississippi segregated, has not held a meeting in several weeks. Gov. J. P. Coleman, nominal head of the commission, was not immediately available for comment.

The Governor (Coleman) interpreted the "reason we have not had integration in Mississippi."

1) Because integrationists realize the resistance that would be given by Mississippians. 2) Our Colored citizens are well pleased and decline to become plaintiffs or guinea pigs of outside agitators. Although the U. S. Supreme Court decision was handed down on May 17, 1954, Mississippi still stands 100 per cent segregated. The Governor said he "honestly believes segregation will stick in Mississippi."

Mississippi can and will legally sidestep integration of her schools, even as this state has done at the ballot box, Gov. J. P. Coleman said here late Thursday. Gov. Coleman declared that any state in the Union may avoid integration by taking full advantage of the legal opportunities available to it. He said that the state of Mississippi has a perfect example in the voter laws which have remained partically (sic) impregnable to the would-be Negro balloteer since 1890. He said that there has been no appreciable increase in the Negro vote in this state despite an all-out effort by the NAACP, because the state constitution make s no provision on voting or elections that refers in any way to race.

Coleman said further that he does not favor Negroes voting in this state and that he hopes that there will never be a strong Republican Party in Mississippi. "The reasons that the Negro should not vote in th s state are obvious," he said "If they vote in numbers, they will vote as a block and you will see politicans (sic) laying up to them as in the Northern states now."

He said that despite all efforts, Mississippi is legally conducting elections in which the Negro is unable to dominate the picture. He declared that by the same token, the schools can be kept from being integrated. "It would be utterly impossible to integrate the schools of any state or this state now, if the state will take the right legal approach," Coleman said.

(Note: Coleman was asked if a special session of the legislature might be called in case the Civil Rights Law is enacted. Excerpts from his answer follow.)

"If I deemed it necessary for the protection of segregation in this state, I would certainly not (p. 11) hesitate to call a special session of the legislature," he said.

(At the midway mark of his administration, Coleman comments )

He points with particular pride to the fact that Mississippi has continued to enjoy segregation of the races without incident "We have not been to the federal courthouse the first time," he says. He thinks that the State Sovereignty Commission, which at times has been beset by controversy, has been serving its purpose as a sort of "watchdog" over segregation. And, further, he thinks that it must be continued in that role. "We cannot afford to abandon our watch and be caught unprepared," he says.

September 27, 1957

(Members of panel of Mississippians were told Thursday night that:)

1. Our unanimity is creating a climate calculated to prevent or minimize racial disturbances.
2. Gov. Coleman will immediately invoke the constitutional authority to close any school at which integration appears imminent, leaving empty classrooms into which troops could march Negro children.
3. Specific plans for handling school integration problems are laid, but will not be "telegraphed to our enemies" by publicity.
4. President Eisenhower went beyond his constitutional authority and congressional intent in sending troops to Arkansas, but there seems no effective remedy at hand.

These points and many others favorable to the maintenance in Mississippi of segregation in public schools were made by a panel of public leaders, questioned by a quartet of citizens of the state on a statewide TV hookup, broadcast without commercial sponsorship as a public service. The program had Governor Coleman, flanked by Senator James O. Eastland and Cong. John Bell Williams on the official panel. It was Coleman who emphasized the fact that Mississippi will never have integrated schools because citizens voted a constitutional amendment to close the schools first. "I doubt," said he, " that the President would get any satisfaction out of guarding any empty school." Governor Coleman said Mississippi has taken the lead in segregation legislation and he praised members of the legislature for their work. He said the big question is whether or not we can preserve our schools if we have to close them for integration threats.

(The following excerpts are taken from an Associated Press story concerning Coleman's statement on the Little Rock integration crisis.)

Governor Coleman Thursday warned that race-mixers "no doubt are trying to goad Mississippi into furnishing an excuse for sending federal troops to integrate the state's schools.

September 27, 1957 (cont'd)

The "unfortunate turn of events in Little Rock has not changed the firm resolution of the State of Mississippi to control its internal affairs in public schools and otherwise. The people of Mississippi may be assured that the Governor and the Legislature have no intention of surrendering at any time or any place to any unjustified, illegal, unconstitutional interference with the rights of this state and of its people. The Governor and the Legislature are in constant conference to this end. Success will not be attained by loud talk and muddy thinking but by well planned action.

Gov. J. P. Coleman plans to name committees in every county and call mass meetings throughout the state to prepare Mississippi's defenses against the new civil rights bill.

(Discussing proposed changes in Mississippi constitution:) Coleman also has said the constitutional provision for separate Negro and white schools should be removed because similar provisions in other Southern states have been the basis for overthrow of segregation laws.

"If the Negro can command the vote under this civil rights bill, then he can, as a matter of course, get everything else."

Gov. J. P. Coleman hinted today he may seek a change in the way Mississippians are registered to vote as a part of the state's defense against civil rights legislation. The governor told the Calhoun City Rotary Club he may ask that the registration function be taken from circuit clerks under the new constitution he hopes to have written. Instead, a three-man commission or board would meet at a regular time once a month to accept registrations.

August 31, 1957

Gov. J. P. Coleman said Friday he will call Mississippi's State Sovereignty Commission into session "at the earliest possible time to consider the situation" growing out of civil rights legislation. He also outlined plans for a statewide committee of lawyers, one from each of Mississippi's 82 counties, to study "this civil rights bill in all its implications and what we've got to do to protect ourselves against it."

August 31, 1957 (cont'd)

Asked today if he thought the civil rights legislation would result in any increase in Negro voting in Mississippi, the governor said: "That all depends, on alot of things. It does not necessarily follow that more would vote, although it could follow through a lack of management and preparation. "This civil rights bill represents an effort by the federal government to vote a man whether he meets state qulifications (sic) or not---and therein lies the great danger," he said. He said that with the defenses he outlined and "certain very necessary changes in the constitution, the people of Mississippi will escape any substantial injury from this federal legislation."

Gov. J. P. Coleman agreeed here Monday with a Jackson member of the legislature that Mississippi should take immediate legislative action to forestall integration of the state's public schools. In answer to a letter from T. Eugene Caldwell, representative from Hinds County, the governor said: "You are correct in that the legislature could now go ahead with the implementation of 213-B of the constitution, and I think it ought to be done if it has any chance of standing up in the federal courts." Section 213-B is the amendment to our state constitution which will allow the abolition of public schools in favor of a private school system.

Gov. J. P. Coleman made a dramatic appeal to a joint session of the Mississippi legislature here Monday afternoon for adoption of his plans for a revision of the Constitution of 1890, basing his plea on segregation.

He told the law-making body that failure to accede to his request would take responsibility for an future integration of schools off his shoulders and onto the backs of themselves. The chief executive painted a dark picture of the possibility that the U.S. Supreme Court may strike down all the laws already made in this state to circumvent integration, citing similar decisions in other state. "If our constitutional provisions will not stand the test, then all statutory provisions enacted pursuant to those provisions would likewise fall the first time they are attacked," Coleman said. "The inevitable result then is to leave Mississippi without any public school laws which will stand up in the federal courts," he said. "We will be left legally naked and defenseless."

Gov. Coleman also warned of the expanding Negro vote in the state and suggested constitutional revision to cope with this threat. He said he was convinced this problem could be handled only by a constitutional convention. Gov. Coleman said the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Virginia case means Mississippi is shorn of enforceable school segregation laws. He said the state's obligation to educate children should be removed from the constitution so that the schools themselves could make a district-(p. 14) by--district defense against integration, sacrificing some schools if necessary but saving the rest.

He declared circuit clerks who now act as registrars, not being lawyers, could be intimidated into allowing "wholesale voting of unqualified voters"--obviously Negroes--under the Civil Rights Act. He proposed three-man registrar boards, with one member a lawyer, but did not say how they would operate. A "host of court decisions," he said, make clear the state cannot have "a segregated private school system supported directly or indirectly with public funds."

Coleman said further bond sales to support the state's 120 million dollar Negro-white equalization program will not be justified if the constitutional safeguards he asked are not adopted. This appeared to be a threat to withhold funds now sought by school districts throughout the state.

By "wiping the state clean" - removing present constitutional authority to abolish schools and requiring separate schools, he said, and adopting a legislative program similar to North Carolina's, the state could become "absolutely immune in the federal courts." The North Carolina school program has been upheld in federal court.

He said Mississippi's constitutional authority to abolish schools should

He said Mississippi's constitutional authority to abolish schools should be removed because legislative journals show "the clear purpose of that amendment was to preserve segregation to the last ditch and then abolish the schools as a last resort."

(Referring to the North Carolina program:)

The federal courts have ruled that pupils "would have to apply for admission on an individual basis if they claimed the law had been administered in their case solely on account of race and color," Coleman said.

This method "would be most effective in Mississippi" and in the event one such suit were won "the closing of one school would not affect any other school still operating on an acceptable basis," the governor said. If the legislature does not act, Coleman said, "then we will soon be compelled--it could happen any day now--to watch our attorney general appear at the federal court house and suffer the humiliating experience of losing the public school system of this state."

Voter registration in ould be taken out of the hands of circuit clerks and given to county election commissioners and examiners under a measure introduced in the Legilature Monday. Gov. J. P. Coleman has suggested such a step to prevent "voting Onslaughts"--obviously by Negroes--under the Civil Rights Act. The House measure was introduced by Reps. David Glass and John Guyton of Attala county. Their resolution bore the notation "by request," which means they acted at the request of someone else.

(In reference to the registration clerks presently in charge:)

Sponsors of the bill told the legislature it was aimed at the National Association fro the Advancement of Colored People because they understood some of the directors have been cited.

Scarbrough (Public Safety Commissioner) said he and his patrolmen, some of them in plain clothes, were assigned to the Ole Miss campus by Gov. J. P. Coleman to preserve the peace.

Coleman, asked Thursday night about reports an attempt would be made to commit King to an institution (Note: a lunacy warrent had been issued against King at the request of Lafayette County Sheriff Boyce Bratton), said "all of his legal rights will be fully preserved." It was evident the Governor was in close touch with the stiuation.

King said he was taken from a line of students waiting to register for summer school and was invited into the administration building for a conference with Registrar Robert Ellis. He was told it would be some time before his application could be processed--probably until after the last day of registration. Told he had to leave, he was not allowed to leave alone. King said, "When I sought to leave the room alone they forced me out another entrance." (Students registering when King was taken from line said that King was carried bodily to the waiting, green station wagon which sped away before newsmen could talk to King on the campus.)

Examination by the two Hinds county doctors was ordered by Chancery Clerk Frank Scott following a statement by Gov. J. P. Coleman who declared King "went berserk" during his attempt at entry to the University Thursday. Coleman said that if the mental examination shows King is sand, he will be tried on charges of disturbing the peace and resisting arrest on the Ole Miss campus at Oxford.

p. 6

Coleman said plain clothes officers followed King's cross-country bus from Gulfport to Oxford. In addition, a plainclothesman was aboard the bus with the professor. "We knew what he was going to do," Coleman said. "He had told it all over the state."

Coleman said the former Alcorn A & M (Negro) College history professor was arrested Thursday morning when he refused to leave the University administration building without registering. He had been told he could not register until his application had been approved--standard college procedure. Coleman told a news conference Friday King's refusal to follow procedure proved "his complete unfitness to become a student in any of the educational institutions supported by the state." The governor said the Georgia-born professor went berserk when Ole Miss authorities and state officers ought to persuade him to leave the campus and await a decision on his hopes to enroll as a graduate student. Coleman said he was brought to state patrol headquarters because he threatened, if released, to return immediately to the campus.

The professor was held incommunicado in a cell and Coleman and other officers refused to disclose his whereabouts.

But Daily News photographer Norm Bergoma and The Associated Press succeeded in tape recording an interview with King through the cell door, the news of which resulted in Coleman ordering guards posted around the building. During his news conference, Coleman said King's whereabouts were kept secret to prevent crowds collecting and possible disorder.

In the interview, King said he wanted only to "get out of here. I don't know what they're going to do. I would like to get out. I wouldn't bother it any more. I would leave it alone." He referred to his attempt at registering.

Gov. J. P. Coleman Saturday repeated his vow that Mississippi schools will remain segregated despite problems which have stricken other southern states.

In reporting Gov. Coleman's speech the United Press International drew the following conclusion: "Coleman said in effect that after the Supreme Court's Little Rock decision Friday the only way Mississippi can maintain an adequate public education system is through voluntary segregation."

"The Governor of Mississippi has promised to operate the schools of this state for the best interest of all children. This means that each race' will have its own teachers; each race will have its own teachers; and each race will march forward with pride in its own accomplishments. There is really nothing 'inferior' about this kind of a program. In the spirit of calmness and confidence, let us keep our poise and dignity. As for myself, I shall keep my promises to the people of Mississippi."

Even before the latest decision Gov. J. P. Coleman warned that "all could be lost" in the federal courts. Coleman's statement indicated he believes Mississippi would have no public school system before she accepted integration. No suits have been filed in Mississippi for integration. Coleman said whether the state has public school in the future may depend on whether the voluntary system of segregation continues.

Coleman stressed that Mississippi is not "afraid" of the issue but is deeply concerned about where the powers of the Supreme Court stop and those of Congress begin. He said that separate schools are in the best interest of both races. Asked whether Mississippi would ever accept integration of schools Coleman repeated his statement of a year ago that "never is a long time," and he would not predict the ultimate outcome.

Gov. J. P. Coleman promised Thursday that Mississippi would maintain segregation despite the efforts of his political enemies who agitate "to improve their political chances..."

"...We are going to keep the schools in Mississippi open, and we are going to operate them on a segregated basis."

Coleman also announced the state textbook Commission has completed work on the list of books approved for high school use during the next four years.

Coleman, a member of the five-man group, said, "We have done our best to select the very best books available and have carefully checked them all as to content."

Before the group of books went before the group, every one was examined by a committee of teachers, who screened out material that might be construed as for integration.

...In 1955, I said in my official platform: (And I am reading the exact language)

> "There will be no necessity to abolish public school, nor will there be any mixing of the races in any of the State-operated educational institutions. This is no task for the amateur or the hothead."

I said this again in my inaugural address when I took the oath of office on January 17, 1956.

Tonight, the people of Mississippi know that I have kept this pledge inviolate. They know that we have had absolutely no mixing of the races in our public schools. And they further know that the schools have been in no danger of closing. We have done this with what amounted to almost complete quietness and we have done it without keeping up a daily atmosphere of fighting and tension. If there be those who would hav enjoyed an uproar they must remember that four years ago I promised the people that the job would be done in quietness and dignity, and the people elected me on that promise. By their vote in 1955, the people indicated that they did not want to be forever in a stew about the safety of racial separation and the existence of their public schools.

June 30, 1959 (cont'd)

There have been a few individuals running around over Mississippi saying that no one man is entitled to the credit for this happy state of affairs. I do not know of any one man who wishes to claim all the credit. I do know that if the cause had been lost and if Mississippi had been integrated, or if we had lost our public school system, these same individuals would be yelling at the top of their well-exercised lungs that the Governor was wholly and solely to blame for the entire catastrophe. They would be dancing on my grave with savage glee. The cold truth is that they have been disappointed with my success and they have done a mighty poor job of hiding their disappointment.

When I was sworn in as Governor, many people fearfully but frankly told me in private that they thought I had over-spoken myself in promising that there would be no race mixing and that there would be no school closing. They said I had made a promise that I could not keep. You see, however, that I have kept that promise to the last letter, and I know that I shall go out of office on the 19th day of next January with racial separation still intact in Mississippi. I ask you, the people of Mississippi, could those who attack me in the newspapers have done a better job than your governor has done? Your answer would be that they could not, because the situation has been perfect insofar as we are concerned. And Mississippi is the only state which enjoys such conditions.

I am sure everybody withing the sound of my voice remembers when Clennon King tried to integrate the University of Mississippi. I am sure they remember that when I came face to face with this dire threat I did not sit scared to death in the governor's office at the State Capitol, nor did I go into a panic, issuing newspaper statements every hour on the hour. I went in person to Oxford, Mississippi, and everybody knows what happened to Clennon King. Where were my critics then? Where were the Monday morning quarterbacks?

They offered no suggestions, they provided no remedies, and they rendered no assistance. When the University had been saved from integration, when Clennon King had left the State, and when our educational institutions sailed ahead as if nothing had ever happened, the habitual critics did not have the courtesy to offer one word of congratulations or to say one word of approval.

What Mississippi needs is leadership possessed of the experience, the courage, the wisdom, the ability, and the resourcefulness to preserve racial separation and at the same time preserve and improve our public schools. Therein lies the only hope for the future of our children.

I am well aware that a little handful of my political adversaries have tried to destroy my place in the affections of my fellow Mississippians by claiming that I am a "moderate." Apparently, these people cannot tell a moderate from a successful segregationist. They have made a great sham of this, and every time they can get a chance they try to stir it up. I ask you to ignore what they say and look at what the record says...I stand on a record of performance and I have delivered the goods. I am not entitled to be called a moderate, and I notice that none of my friends have called me that...

(Coleman answers attack for not following the Governor of Arkansas:)

Let us examine the record. Nobody can argue with the record.

When the schools were integrated at Hoxie, at Van Buren, at Fort Smith, and other places in Arkansas, Governor Faubus made no effort to stop that integration. When trouble flared up in Arkansas, Governor Faubus made no effort to stop that integration. When race mixing finally got to the State Capitol at Little Rock, he did try to stop it. Do you believe it would be right for me to refuse to fight until it got within the shadow of the State Capitol at Jackson? Do you believe it would be right for me to let the NAACP integrate Lexington, or Greenwood, or Macon without raising my hand to stop it? In my view of things, if I were to follow this policy, I would not be the Governor of Mississippi, I would simply be the Governor of Jackson. I have adopted the rule of stopping integration anywhere it raises its head, regardless of the town, and I have enforced that rule.

Governor Faubus had done nothing about race mixing at the University of Arkansas. I could not follow him in this. When they attempted to mix the races at the University of Mississippi, I stopped it cold.

Many of you have heard Governor Faubus say on nationwide television that his son attended an integrated college. I cannot follow the Governor in sending his son to an integrated college. I have sent my son to the University of Mississippi, where the races are apart. People ordinarily do not send their children to schools that they do not approve of, and I feel that if I were to send my son to a mixed school I would be publicly approving of race mixing, and I would be setting an example for the entire populace to follow.

Governor Faubus appointed a Negro to a high party office in Arkansas. If I had followed him on this, Mr. Bidwell Adam, who got beat for re-election as Lieutenant Governor by 44,000 votes twenty-seven years ago, and who introduced Mr. Faubus at Biloxi, would no doubt have had a stroke. However, since Governor Faubus appointed a Negro, it was, of course, perfectly all right with Bidwell.

In a speech which he delivered on June 13th at Biloxi, at the Miss. Bar Association, Governor Faubus said the people ought to be allowed to mix the races in the public schools if they wanted to, or that they should be allowed to keep the races separate if they wanted to. That might please both sides, but that is not the public policy of the State of Mississippi. We believe that it is to the best interest of both races that they have their own schools throughout the State and that everybody operate under the same rule. Therefore, I could not follow Governor Faubus in supporting local option on segregation.

"The people will remember Clennon King and where he landed," he said. "If you want your schools and colleges to remain open and to remain separate, then give me your vote and I shall not betray your trust," he vowed.

He said that he planned to be a leader among the Southern states, and recalled that he was unanimously elected the Southern leader at the annual meeting of governors in Chicago, 1956.

Coleman arose to declare that "when I was governor, segregation was maintained." He said that he voted for Kennedy and Johnson but that one vote does not make a man's career, and you cannot condemn him forever. Coleman then reminded his audience that as attorney general in Mississippi for five years he would not let mixed prize fights or baseball come to Mississippi, thought pressure was brought.

June 12, 1963

Coleman called Kennedy's Tuesday night speech after the Alabama integration "the greatest challenge to the South in 100 years."

He said the South has two weapons to battle the Kennedy plan. One of these is the filibuster in the Senate, and the other is the chairmanship of the powerful Senate Judiciary Committee, in the hands of Senator J.O. Eastland of Mississippi.

Coleman said rumored attempts to purge Eastland because Mississippi bolted the Democratic Party in the 1960 election was the main reason he supported the party ticket in that election.

Coleman said he will fight "any man who is an enemy of Mississippi." Whether his name is "Kennedy or Rockefeller or any other you might name."

He said a Coleman defeat in the August 6 primary would "please Bobby Kennedy beyond expression. I can mix it up with them."

He said he would let the NAACP, CORE, and similar professional rabble rousers "Know what I propose to do and how it is to be done when the time is ripe, and not a minute before."

"I propose," he said, "to seek a South-wide convention to take stock of our troubles and to come up with a remedy which at least a half dozen Southern states will support... No national politician can laugh at the solid effect of as many as six states."

"You have no intention of tolerating the destruction of these institutions (schools and Universities of Mississippi) by the process of integration."

He said that Mississippi's relationship with the federal government is the state's paramount problem at present. "Not only in the field of race relations, but in every other area of activity of the federal government."

He said he thinks Mississippi can defeat federal encroachment on state's rights through "quiet, effective work, backed by all the power and dignity of the governor's office in a statesman-like manner."

Former Governor J.P. Coleman said Tuesday his opponents have taken a defeatist attitude on the race issue. Speaking at Monticello, Morgantown, and McComb, Coleman said he is the only candidate "with hope of stemming widespread integration and the ability and experience to do it. My opponents say that I cannot stop it," he declared, "because they have apparently lost hope and have offerred no plan or suggestion for maintaining separation of the races."

"The only racial trouble in this state from 1956 - 1960 was when Negro Clennon King decided he wanted to go to Ole' Miss. Claiming that both Johnson and Sullivan "feel that an uproar and turmoil are inevitable in the fight for states'-rights," Coleman said that sovereignty can be maintained peacefully.

"But not by knocking over the paramount rules of the United States. You just have to learn how to plow around them," he added.

"But if Coleman goes down in defeat, you can look forward to half a dozen poli ical opportunists running against Senator John Stennis next year with the same argument. And the same thing goes for Senator Jim Eastland the following year."

"Because they voted the Democratic ticket in 1960, also. We did it to save Senator Eastland's chairmanship of the vital Senate Judiciary Committee...one of our main weapons against the civil rights bill."

August 2, 1963

p. 12

Coleman cited his handling of Negro Clennon King, "who wanted to go to Ole' Miss, but who wound up in another of our fine institutions caled Whitfield."

He said King "learned more at Whitfield than he would have at Ole' Miss in three years." We gave him his diploma, he went to Hawaii, and that's about as close to Mississippi as he ever wants to be."

He (Coleman) told the crowd, "if you really want to help the Kennedy's then vote for the candidate who is not prepared by experience and training to do battle with them and who will be duck soup and the easiest for them to run over, and I can assure you that that man is not J.P. Coleman."

p. 2

Coleman repeated the story about Negro Clennon King, who attempted to register at Ole Miss during Coleman's tenure as governor but who was committed to Whitfield after two weeks after being held in-communicado for some time by highway patrolmen.

"The point of this story," he said, "is not the fact that one man was kept out of Ole Miss. Rather it shows that we know how to protect your rights in such a way that the federal government could find no excuse for putting hands on the state of Mississippi."

SUPPLEMENTAL MEMORANDUM ON APPOINTMENT OF FORMER MISSISSIPPI GOVERNOR J. P. COLEMAN TO U. S. FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS: BILLS SIGNED INTO LAW BY GOVERNOR COLEMAN

A review of a few of the legislative enactments signed by James P. Coleman during his term of office as Governor of Mississippi seems to conclusively demonstrate that he would be actively opposed to protecting and securing the civil rights of Negro American citizens if confirmed by the United States Senate as a Judge on the United States Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit. This review follows, together with an attached appendix of some of these laws.

1. In 1956 Governor Coleman signed into law Chapters 273 and 288 (Gen. Laws Miss. 1956), acts confirming a steadfast policy of racial segregation in the state's public schools and repealing the state's compulsory education laws (so as to be able to close individual schools within the state if required to desegregate by federal court orders). He also signed acts requiring railroad and bus companies to maintain separate waiting rooms and toilet facilities for the races traveling in intra-state commerce and requiring all intra-state passengers to use such separate facilities. (Chapters 258-60, General Laws of Mississippi, 1956). Criminal penalties of $1000 and/or one year in jail for each violation of these acts were provided, and it was explicitly stated that an intra-state passenger arrested for violating the state-imposed segregation laws, could have no action of false imprisonment against the arresting officer, nor could he recover damages from common carriers complying with these statutes.

2. In 1956, when Governor Coleman signed these acts, it was perfectly clear from the broad language in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483 (1954), that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade all racial segregation in the public schools, and all other state enforcement of racial separation such as prescribed by the acts requiring that segregated waiting rooms and toilet facilities by maintained by common carriers.

In signing these acts into law, Governor Coleman was intentionally seeking to frustrate what he knew to be a requirement of the Federal [1] Constitution. The acts repealing the state's compulsory educatinn laws and confirming its policy of racial segregation were deliberately designed to circumvent anticipated efforts by the federal courts,[2] on which James P. Coleman seeks to sit, to enforce the Constitution of the United States.

3. Even more frightening is the support given to the patently absurb doctrine of interposition by Governor Coleman which he signed into law Chapter 254, General Laws of Mississippi, 1956. The law sought to "give effect to the Resolution of Interposition, Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 125, and to the principle of segregation of the races" by directing the Governor and the entire executive branch of the State of Mississippi "to prohibit by any lawful, peaceful and constitutional means, the implementation of or the compliance with the integration decisions of the United States Supreme Court. . . and to prohibit by any lawful, peaceful, and constitutional means the causing of a mixing or integration of the white and Negro races in public schools, public parks and public waiting rooms." That Governor Coleman should have sought to frustrate a federal constitutional policy is bad enough; that he signed his name in support of a constitutional doctrine long and rightly regarded as ridiculous, and which, if adopted, would reduce our federal republic to a meek confederation of states serves to point out his compelling disqualifications for appointment to a judgeship in a circuit which elaborates constitutional policy.

Governor Coleman's sincere support of interposition and deliberate opposition to the United States Constitution is further evidenced by his approval of Chapter 365, an Act creating the State Sovereignty Commission of which the Governor was chairman. The duty of this body was to perform "all acts and things deemed necessary and proper to protect the sovereignty of the state of Mississippi, and her sister states, from encroachment thereon by the Federal Government." (Ch. 365, Sec. 5).

4. Additional impediments to the fulfillment of constitutional rights are found in Chapter 253, an Act to prohibit the fomenting of litigation by making it unlawful to donate or receive funds for the purpose of filing or prosecuting lawsuits. This legislation was aimed at the Legal Defense Fund of the NAACP and other organizations seeking to confirm by lawsuit the constitutional rights of Negro citizens.

5. Governor Coleman also signed an enactment (Ch. 257, General Laws, Mississippi, 1956) conferring upon all public businesses an absolute right to select their customers and subjecting any person refusing to vacate a public place at the owner's request to a fine of up to $500 and/or imprisonment of up to six months. The custom of segregation by private individuals was further buttressed by the Governor's approval of Chapter 256, a broad breach of the peace statute, covering "any person who shall enter any public place of business (and) . . . create a disturbance or a breach of the peace in any way whatsoever including, but not restricted to. . .the making of threats or attempting to intimidate.

1 See Jackson Clarion-Ledger, Feb. 25, 1956. 2. Ibid.

6. In 1958, Governor Coleman signed into law Chapter 311, a measure designed to cope with any attempts to desegregate Mississippi schools by authorizing the Governor to close any one or more or all schools of any or all school districts. The Governor also signified his approval of Chapters 257 and 261 of the General Laws of 1958, acts providing that the Attorney General should offer legal assistance to any school district or executive officer, agency or commission of the State of Mississippi proceeded against in state or federal courts or investigated by the federal civil rights commission.

7. In addition to supporting these plainly unconstitutional objectives, Governor Coleman gave his approval to Chapter 484, an act requiring investigation by the state Attorney General or legislative committee of any organization deemed subversive. Subversiveness consisted of having a national or state officer who either in the past or at present is or has been an officer of any organization designated as subversive by the United States Attorney General or a Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities. The purpose of the investigation was to secure a membership list from such organizations, and thereby to intimidate their members and keep them from participating in activities designed to achieve equality for all citizens of Mississippi.

8. In 1956 Gov. Coleman also signed into the state's law books legislation which almost made it impossible for local citizens to get lawyers from other states to defend them in Mississippi Courts. This legislation, Chapter 255 of the 1956 General Laws of Mississippi, repealed the old section 8666 of the 1942 Code which had permitted any attorney from any other state to appear in local courts. The only requirement was that the attorney be in good standing in his home state.

But the new Mississippi law sets up elaborate procedures which an out-of-state attorney now must follow before he can represent anyone. Under Chapter 255 a private group, the State Bar Association, is given the power of making the determination. Its only guideline for deciding is the vague phrase of "the usages and customs of the State of Mississippi."

The real impact of this law can only be seen by considering the background in which it operates. It is virtually impossible to get white Mississippi lawyers to take civil rights cases, Even if the individual attorney would want to, his ordinary legal practice would be seriously hurt and socially he would become a pariah. Of course, Negro attorneys in Mississippi will handle such cases, but there are only four of them for the entire state.

Thus Chapter 255 as approved by Governor Coleman makes it exceedingly difficult for Mississippi citizens to secure adequate legal protection of their civil rights against discriminatory practices.

9. Finally, in 1958 Governor Coleman approved the enactment of

Chapter 257 which authorized the State attorney general to defend "upon request and at his discretion" circuit clerks and registrars of various counties who are either sued or called as witnesses in state or federal court by the United States Commission on Civil Rights, by the United States Government, or by any other federal agency. A similar discretion is also given the attorney general with regard to suits brought against officers or employees of school districts and other state and municipal officials. (See Chapter 261 of General Laws of Mississippi of 1958.)

Time and again in recent years suits have been brought against the above public officials because of their violations of the civil rights of American citizens. This legislation clearly has no other object than to permit Mississippi officials to continue their tactics of evading the law and to place through taxation the financial burden of legally defending these officials upon the very people whose rights have been violated.

APPENDIX

SUMMARY OF LAWS APPROVED BY GOVERNOR J. P. COLEMAN

1956

(1) Chapter 273. General Laws of Mississippi. 1956. Approved by Governor J. P. Coleman, April 5, 1956.

The main purpose of this act is to reorganize school districts. It contains however the following provisions:

> "In all school districts, separate schools shall be maintained or otherwise provided for children of the white and colored races."

(2) Chapter 288, General Laws of Mississippi, 1956. Approved by Governor J. P. Coleman, February 24, 1956.

An act to repeal the compulsory education laws, thus allowing parents to withdraw their children from school in the event of desegregation and clearing the way for Chapter 311 of the General Laws of 1958, Infra (See below), authorizing the Governor to close any or all schools in the state.

Statement of Mr. Aaron E. Henry, President
Mississippi State Conference, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
On the nomination of J.P. Coleman to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals
Tuesday morning, June 29, 1965

The nomination of former Governor J. P. Coleman by President Johnson to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals totally ignores the long years of suffering by the Negro community of Mississippi at the hands of J.B. Coleman during the time he was Attorney-General and Governor.

Before making this nomination, the President and the Attorney-General were informed that J. P. Coleman as Attorney-General and Governor of Mississippi was a major participant in the enactment of our State's current voter registration laws which deny thousands of Negroes their right to register and vote. In the past four years some 69,000 Negro citizens have gone to the county courthouses in Mississippi and asked for their right to vote. Fewer than 6,000 have made it because of the voting laws passed during the time that J.P. Coleman was Attorney-General. In order to register, these laws require a citizen to interpret any of the 286 sections of the Mississippi State Constitution to the satisfaction of the circuit clerk. The applicant does not know which section of the Constitution he will be asked to interpret until he appears at the registration office. As a result of the enactment of these laws in 1955, Reverend George W. Lee, a NAACP voter registration official was killed in Belzoni. Mr. Gus Courts of Belzoni was shot. Mr. T. V. Johnson was intimidated to the point that he had his name removed from the registration rolls of Humphries County. These three were the only Negroes in the county registered at the time.

The President and Attorney-General were also informed that the State Sovereignty Commission was established by the Mississippi legislature during Governor Coleman's term of office. The Commission is a segregationist watchdog committee, sitting in judgment upon all of us in Mississippi, both Negro and white, who advocate the obedience to Federal law within the State. The State Sovereignty Commission has consistently given funds to the White Citizens Councils to support their evil existence and constant intimidation and harrassment of the Negroes of Mississippi. The Council also intimidates white Mississippians who just want to obey federal law.

The President and Attorney-General were also reminded that in dealing with a Negro's right to attend the University of Mississippi, Governor Coleman had the student applicant, Clennon King, committed to the State institution for the mentally ill. He has proudly boasted of his actions in this incident many times.

These are but a few examples of the actions and attitudes of J. P. Coleman which to thousands of Mississippi Negroes disqualify him for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. This position would require him to render decisions upholding federal law and to be fair and impartial to all citizens without regard to race, creed or color. J. P. Coleman has consistently demonstrated his unwillingness to uphold federal law and the lack of fairness to all people regardless of race.

The Senate of the United States has recently passed a bill which will greatly help the Negroes of Mississippi to finally secure their right to vote. I implore the Senate not to confirm the nomination of a judge who will be able to subvert the intent of that vitally-needed law. Negroes in Mississippi have waited too long for simple justice from State Officials to now be denied justice by racist federal judges.

IN OPPOSITION TO THE APPOINTMENT OF

JAMES PLEMON COLEMAN

TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

Washington Human Rights Project

More and more Americans are becoming alarmed about the proposed appointment of James P. Coleman, former governor of Mississippi and architect of many of the state's segregation laws, to the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. The purpose of this memorandum is to show that the choice of J. P. Coleman would be a tragic one. To demonstrate this contention we have presented responses to the arguments given by those who are supporting his nomination.

Those in favor of Coleman have offered the following three arguments. First, he is a moderate, and not an ardent segregationist. Secondly, the next appointee to the Fifth Circuit must come from Mississippi and the best possible man that Senator Eastland will approve is J. P. Coleman. Finally, it is asserted, even if Coleman were a segregationist in the past, his impartial position as a federal judge with life tenure would enable him to escape both local political pressures and his own racist background.

Before considering these arguments, it is necessary to emphasize how important it is to find the right man to fill the current vacancy. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals is the keystone in the development of legal doctrine for the protection of rights guaranteed to Negroes by the laws and Constitution of the United States. The district courts within the six states comprising that circuit are notorious for their refusal to enforce these rights. And the Supreme Court, burdened with an ever-heavier caseload, has shown a great willingness to rely upon decisions of the Fifth Circuit in the area of racial discrimination. This court itself rarely sits en banc, i. e., as a whole, with all nine members. Rather, three judges at a time hear a case. Hence, looking at the alignment of the entire court on civil rights matters is an unfruitful pursuit. As long as there are as many as four judges of a segregationist bent, they will constitute a majority on some of the panels, and thus be in a position to thwart crucial efforts at securing equal rights.

One of the glaring examples of such judicial obstruction was provided by the late Judge Cameron, whose seat Governor Coleman has been nominated to occupy. The Justice Department had filed suits against the states of Mississippi and Louisiana, seeking to have declared unconstitutional many of the voting provisions responsible for Negro disfranchisement in those states. The Louisiana case overturned that state's literacy test, the familiar requirement of interpreting the Constitution, LSA-R.S. 18:35. It also suspended in 21 parishes the use of its "citizenship" test, LSA-R.S. 18:191 (requiring the applicant to demonstrate his knowledge of the duties and obligations of citizenship) until such time as the effects of prior discrimination shall have been removed from the registration rolls, if need be by a complete reregistration. United States v. Louisiana, 225 F. Supp. 353 (E.D.La 1963). The decision was recently affirmed by the Supreme Court. Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145 (1965).

In the Mississippi case, however, on which Judge Cameron sat as part of a statutory three- judge panel (28 U.S.C. §2281), the court refused to let the case go to trial. United States v. Mississippi, 229 F. Supp. 925 (S.D. Miss. 1964). And yet the government had produced evidence of the most detailed and exhaustive sort, very similar to that in the Louisiana case and just as convincing. Mississippi has both the constitutional interpretation test and the citizenship test. Miss. Const. 1890, §244, as amended by Miss. Laws, 1955, Ex ch 133. In a thorough and persuasive dissent Judge Brown found abundant evidence of the unconstitutionality of this Mississippi constitutional provision. 229 F. Supp. at 974.

However, among the grounds assigned by Judges Cameron and Harold Cox for the dismissal of the action was a refusal to recognize the propriety of joining the state of Mississippi as a defendant. The decision was wholly repudiated by the Supreme Court on the same day it affirmed Louisiana. United States v. Mississippi, 380 U.S. 128 (1965). The court held unanimously that "nothing has ever been seriously supposed to prevent a state's being sued by the United States." 380 U.S. at 140. Of Judge Cameron's opinion, it said that "it seems rather surprising that the District Court entertained seriously the argument that the United States could not constitutionally sue a state." 380 U.S. at 140-41.

The second main ground relied upon by Cameron and Cox for dismissing the suit was that the Government had stated no claim of action upon which relief could be granted. Reacting sharply to this argument the Court declared:

> "The allegations of this complaint were too serious, the right to vote in this connection too precious, and the necessity of settling grievances peacefully in the courts is too important for this complaint to have been dismissed. . . . The case should have been tried. It should now be tried without delay. 380 U.S. at 144.

Thus the case was remanded for trial; but, as a result of the Cameron-Cox dismissal, the final decision has been delayed for at least a year if not longer.

Besides U. S. v. Mississippi, Cameron was also part of a three-judge panel in a number of other important civil rights cases. In Boman v. Birmingham Transit Co., 292 F. 2d 4 (5th Cir, 1961), he maintained that there were essential differences between the two races and that these justified a policy of segregation. He rejected the Brown school board decision of 1954 by stating that segregation did not have an adverse effect upon Negroes and Negro children. In U. S. v. Wood, 295 F 2 772 (5th Cir 1961), he echoed his Boman stand and declared that circuit court judges in the South should render their decisions according to the "ethos of the people whose servants they are." In Bailey v. Patterson, 323 F 2 201 (5th Cir, 1963), where three Negroes, on behalf of themselves and all other members of their race, sought to enjoin the enforcement of municipal segregation laws affecting common carriers, Cameron wanted to uphold the district court's decision which ridiculously declared the laws unconstitutional only with regard to the three Negroes and not as to others. Thus any Negro wanting to ride in the front of a bus would first have to sue before he could sit down.

Fortunately, in all these cases Cameron was alone in dissent so that the plaintiff's rights were safeguarded. Thus, at first glance, it would seem that Cameron's racial views were nullified. It might be argued that, even if Coleman were a segregationist, his views also would be negated in most cases by a two-to-one vote. But this argument overlooks the damaging effect which a biased judge can have on a three-judge court. There is room for harassment and the use of delaying tactics while sitting. A greater hurden is now cast upon the other two judges. Instead of being able to rely upon their colleague to do his share of legal research and reasoning, the two must do the work which the law originally intended for three. This problem is even more serious when it is recalled that four of the nine judges in the Fifth Circuit are either inclined toward segregation or are outright segregationists. These circumstances can only result in a loss of time, overcrowded dockets, and of greater consequence, the delay and even the denial of protection to citizens of their basic civil and political rights.

Perhaps the most shocking example of how a judge can abuse his power was Judge Cameron's actions in the famous Meredith case. Meredith v. Fair, 305 F 2d 343 (5th Cir), cert. denied, 371 U. S. 828 (1962). The long odyssey of James Meredith, a Negro who sought only to enroll in a state university which his own tax money supported, finally seemed to have reached a successful conclusion when the Fifth Circuit ruled in his favor. But this hope was premature, for Judge Cameron on four separate occasions held up the remand directive to the district court. Without the directive, Meredith could not enroll. Ultimately, it took the intervention of Justice Black of the Supreme Court who was forced to invoke his power and set aside the fourth stay order. Only then was Meredith's quest for justice completed.

After reviewing these and other instances of misbehaviour by segregation-minded judges, one author evaluated the various means which could be used to remedy the problem. In summing up, he wrote in his article "Judicial Performance in the Fifth Circuit" at 73 Yale Law Journal 90, 122 (1963):

> ". . . The ability of a judge to resist discipline, limited only by the near-impossibilities of impeachment or contempt, is profound testimony to the importance of selecting judges who will comply in the first instance."

"The principal cure," he concluded, "must be found in the appointment of judges who will disinterestedly comply with decisions of higher courts." 73 Yale Law Journal 131.

At the present time, there is no indication that the tide of civil rights litigation will recede. In fact, the trend is in the other direction. If appointed to the Fifth Circuit, Governor Coleman would be in a unique position to further his segregationist ideals by the "legal" means he has always espoused for resisting Congress and the Supreme Court.

Consider, for example, a challenge to the constitutionality of any Mississippi statute or administrative proceeding, which must be made pursuant to the provisions of 28 U. S. C. §2281 (1958). The suit would have to begin with application to one of the District Court judges sitting in Mississippi. All three, Clayton, Cox, and until recently the late Judge Mize, have been known for their resistance to the implementation of Negro equality. Then, two more judges would be assigned by Chief Judge Tuttle of the Fifth Circuit. One would most likely be the Appeals judge sitting from Mississippi. In the U. S. v. Mississippi case, Cameron was the judge assigned. Therefore, if Coleman's nomination is approved, he and a Mississippi district judge will constitute a majority, and will be in a position to thwart every attempt to make Mississippi law conform to the requirements of the Constitution. It will be particularly ludicrous if Coleman sits as part of the court in the Mississippi case, since it was Coleman himself who was, first as attorney general, then as governor, and finally as a legislator, a leading figure in the erection of many of the legal barriers to full and equal voting rights in that state. (1)

The situation will be much the same in any other constitutional challenge to Mississippi's apartheid statues. Of particular concern to a Senate which has invoked closure and passed a strong voting rights bill is the potential role of ex-Governor Coleman under that act. The utilization of federal voting examiners to register qualified Negroes in Mississippi is a recognized necessity and a provision of both the Senate and House versions of the bill. But the bill also provides that when the state seeks to challenge such registrations (as it assuredly will do in almost every instance), it must make direct application to the Court of Appeals. There Mississippi will have the friendly ear of Judge Coleman.

Lastly, the importance of filling the current vacancy with the proper person can also be measured by all of the other important civil rights matters which will be coming up in the near future. The regulations issued by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for the dispersal of federal funds under the 1964 Civil Rights Act will undoubtedly be tested in Southern federal courts. No one knows how much litigation will be generated by the fair employment provisions of that same act. Test cases still have to be brought on restaurants and other public accomodations which have tried to evade the provisions of the '64 Act by converting into so-called "private" clubs. And then there are still the many public accomodations and even state-owned facilities in the South which simply flout the law and refuse to serve all Americans.

We would now like to return to those arguments which we stated at the beginning of this paper and which are often given for why Coleman should be appointed.

First, Coleman has been called a moderate. The evidence for this statement is supposed to be his political record in Mississippi State politics. After examining the evidence, our conclusion is exactly the opposite. In his own words, he has said,"Let there be no misunderstanding about it. I am a segregationist." (2) (See Appendix). Not only in his speeches, but also by his actions, Coleman has given ample proof to back up this claim.

He defied (3) the Supreme Court by advocating the moribund theory of interposition. This principle (4), contrary to the supremacy clause of Article VI of the Constitution, supposedly allows a state on its own motion to nullify federal law within the state. While Coleman was Governor, he signed Chapter 254 into the state law books, which attempted to bind all members of the Mississippi executive to a policy of segregation and interposition. (5)

His administration took drastic measures in attempts to impede school desegregation. He openly schemed (6) on how Mississippi could circumvent Supreme Court rulings. He even signed a bill which repealed the compulsory school attendance laws so that he would be able to close any school which was ordered to integrate. (7) Here was no moderation, no statesmanlike efforts at peacefully bringing about school desegregation. Here were active and continuous attempts to resist this constitutionally required change.

Every means was employed to deny Negro citizens of Mississippi their voting rights. As governor he candidly advocated the passage of new voting laws which would help to prevent Negroes from registering. (8) Such laws would be in direct conflict with the Fifteenth Amendment which promises that no American citizen will be deprived of his voting rights because of his race.

Coleman did not play a passive role while segregation was being further entrenched in Mississippi's social and political life. He constantly made suggestions on how the system of discrimination could be bolstered by further laws. (9) At one point he called for a state constitutional convention, (10a) but not even the Mississippi legislature was willing to tolerate this drastic proposal. To maintain a segregated school system, he was determined to close down any school ordered to desegregate (10b). He was one of the main instigators in getting Southern governors to cooperate with each other in order to oppose the Supreme Court. (11)

Coleman's administration also denied other rights guaranteed to American citizens by the Bill of Rights. School books were censored by the removal of all material which in any way could be construed as favoring integration. (12) The act signed by Coleman setting up the State Sovereignty Commission tried to despoil citizens of their Fifth Amendment right to be free from self-incrimination. (13)

In some situations the ex-Governor was willing to go to any lengths to preserve segregation, perpetrating actions which would be repugnant to anyone but a die-hard racist. When Professor Clennon King tried to register at the University of Mississippi in 1958, he was bodily seized by highway patrolmen and held incommunicado for two weeks. He then was placed in a mental hospital and finally was forced to leave the state. (14) Governor Coleman openly boasted that he was responsible for these events. (15a) Toward the close of Coleman's administration in 1959 another Negro who attempted to register in an all-white college was arrested on trumped-up charges and sent to prison. He later died, partly as a result of the mistreatment he had suffered. (15b)

It is hard to see how anyone who has impartially read what Governor Coleman has said and done could arrive at any other conclusion than that Coleman should be taken at his word, that he is a "segregationist." His constant and tireless efforts to preserve and strengthen Mississippi's system of segregation are eloquent testimony of his political and social philosophy.

The second argument presented in support of the Coleman nomination is that the next appointee to the Fifth Circuit must come from Mississippi to fill the seat Cameron held as a Mississippian and that the "most moderate" man Senator Eastland will approve is Coleman. It first must be emphasized that there is no law stating that the next appointee must be from Mississippi. Not every state must have "it's representative" on one of the ten Circuit Courts. In fact, four states are totally unrepresented, having none of their citizens sitting on a Court of Appeals bench. (16) Moreover, the whole notion of a state having a Circuit seat is false. Circuit courts are not political bodies cutting future social and economic policy out of whole cloth. If they were, then the argument of state representation would be valid. True enough, we have outgrown the myth that judges "do not make the law, they only find it." Yet there are certain limitations within which judges must work, boundaries set by the Constitution, by Supreme Court decisions, by past precedents, and by the logical working out and historical evolution of legal doctrine. Thus there is no necessity dictated either by law, by custom, or by political theory that the next judge must come from Mississippi.

Some have asserted, however, that because of the privilege of senatorial courtesy Senator Eastland should have control over who is appointed to the Fifth Circuit. Again this is part of the theme that somehow the vacancy "belongs" to Mississippi. Even conceding that it may be expedient to allot appointments among the various states, there are strong grounds for stating that the privilege of senatorial courtesy should not be applicable when a Circuit Court appointment is at stake.

"Senatorial courtesy" is a term applied to two related practices of the Senate in its relationship with the President concerning federal appointments. Most federal appointments involve a particular state, for example, local federal marshals or postmasters. The custom has developed that each senator can recommend to the President, if he is of the same political party, a list of people who should be appointed to various federal posts in the senator's home state. Related to this is the practice that if a senator declares a particular appointment in his state is "personally obnoxious" to him, the other senators out of deference will not approve the nomination.

A three-fold rationale is normally presented to justify this privilege. First, the Fathers who wrote the Constitution intended that the Senate have a voice in federal appointments. Secondly, since each senator is more directly answerable to the people of his own state than either the President or the other senators, he will tend to be more conscientious in making sure that good men are appointed. The third and main reason was forcefully expressed by Senator Douglas in 1941 when he said that the President "cannot, in the nature of things, in the vast majority of instances, know the qualifications of lawyers and local judges within a given state as well as do the Senators from that State." 82nd Cong. 1st sess. (daily ed., October 9, 1941), p. 13101.

The answer to the first ground is that, although the Senate is required to approve all nominees, nowhere in the Constitution is any reference made to an individual senator having the power either to make recommendations or to block appointments. Indeed, the wording of the clause in Article II, Section 2, (17) seems to convey the opposite inference that an approval is to be the collective decision of the whole Senate with each senator making up his own mind.

As far as the second reason is concerned, it loses its logical force when applied to the appointment of a federal circuit judge. Whatever argument can be made as to the political responsibility of a senator for appointments to federal administrative offices situated within his state, the argument should carry little weight when we are talking about a judge. To allow senatorial courtesy to hold absolute sway here is to invite the danger that federal judgeships will become little more than political plums to be handed out by each senator as payment for past favors. Moreover, the argument is further weakened by the fact that a circuit judge hears cases from a number of states. Those living in other states simply have no way to hold the senator politically accountable for bad choices.

Thirdly, the Douglas defense of senatorial courtesy based on a senator's knowledge does have some relevance even as to the appointment of a circuit judge. But when this is balanced against the interest of the other states within the particular circuit that a qualified and impartial person be appointed,the courtesy privilege should not be given the same effect as in ordinary in-state federal appointments.

Thus, all of the various reasons normally given for the application of senatorial courtesy to federal appointments are either irrelevant or only marginally so when an appointment is to be made, as in the present instance, to fill a vacancy on a Circuit Court.

Finally, to round off the second argument, even if senatorial courtesy can properly be invoked in the case of a circuit judge, there have been occasions in the past when the Senate has, despite the invoking of the privilege, refused to concur in its exercise. In 1936 Senator Bilbo of Mississippi attempted to veto the appointment of Judge Holmes to the Fifth Circuit. But the Judiciary Committee unanimously recommended the nominee, and the Senate confirmed by a 59 to 4 vote.

An even more significant example of the Senate's discretion in this area was the attempted appointment in 1930 of Judge Parker, a citizen of the state of North Carolina. Parker, after having sat on the 4th Circuit bench for 5 years, was nominated by President Hoover to fill a Supreme Court vacancy. His name was placed in nomination at a public hearing by Senator Overman of North Carolina who was the chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee. Due to the political activity of the N.A.A.C.P. and labor unions, both of whom feared that Parker because of his past record would be anti-Negro and anti-labor if appointed, Parker's nomination was not accepted. And this happened despite presidential backing and the enthusiastic support of Parker's home-state senator who was a member of the Judiciary Committee. The parallels of that situation with the present are striking. Here also Coleman has been nominated by the President. He is supported by his own Senator, James Eastland, who is on the Judiciary Committee. Parker was rejected partly because some feared his possible racist views. There is no reason why our present Senate could not, if they find that Coleman is a segregationist, likewise withold consent to his nomination.

The third contention which the Coleman proponents fall back on is the old belief that if appointed to the bench, a man will lose his political biases, that he will become fair-minded and impartial. This belief, however, will not stand up under historical scrutiny. Using a person's past background, it has been relatively easy to predict, especially with regard to the lower federal court appointees, what kinds of decisions a particular judge would be inclined to render.

Justice Black, however, is one example many have cited as to the effect a judicial office can have on a person. Supposedly, Black, who was at one time a member of the Ku Klux Klan, was changed into the liberal that he is today by his appointment to the Supreme Court. But historically this is absolutely false. His link with the KKK seems to have been nothing more than an honorary membership conferred upon him by the Klan in the 1920's.

More importantly, his whole record as a Senator prior to his appointment shows him to have been a liberal in both domestic and foreign affairs. He was the only Senator who spoke out in July, 1932, about the "militaristic way" in which the Bonus Marchers had been handled by the federal government. In 1933 he introduced a bill advocating an unheard-of thirty-hour week for workers. He strongly supported Social Security, TVA, and minimum wage laws. By the end of his senate career, he was acknowledged leader of the Progressives and an ally of Senator LaFollette and Mayor LaGuardia. Black's career certainly cannot be used as a precedent for speculating as to a possible Coleman conversion.

Indeed, history gives an opposite lesson. At least five of the Kennedy appointees carried their racist views right along with them when they assumed their judicial offices. (18) The worst example is Judge Harold Cox of Mississippi. Cox had been a roommate of Senator Eastland's at "Ole Miss" and both had remained life-long friends. More significantly, Cox had been closely aligned with the states-rights and rabid segregation faction of Mississippi politics. There should have been little difficulty in predicting what he would be like as a judge. Yet in private interviews with officials of the United States Justice Department just prior to the approval of Judge Cox, assurances were given that he was a moderate, and even if not, he would change. After examining Cox's appalling record as a district judge, one can only recall Santayana's oft-repeated warning that those who do not learn by history are forced to relive it.

In conclusion, the present vacancy on the Fifth Circuit is far more than a question of politics. Two hundred years ago our society committed itself to the proposition that all men are created equal. For two hundred years we have toiled to make that belief a concrete reality. Too many Americans have died now in too many wars. Too many have been lynched for freedom. Too many have shed blood in the struggle for civil rights. Our society has made a deep and fundamental choice: a man's rights will not be measured by the color of his skin. We cannot go back. The evidence gathered against ex-Governor Coleman is too damning. His very words and actions prove him an avowed segregationist. Moreover, there is too much here at stake to gamble on what history declares an empty hope that Coleman will change his views. Such a man should never be appointed to hold one of the highest offices, a federal Circuit Court judgeship.

Attorney General J. P. Governor C oleman . . . said that while there are no such legal terms as interposition or nullification, that he has never (Emphasis supplied) objected to the use of the term interposition and that he will support it in the terms he understands are implied.
Interposition, he explained, is a stand interposing rights of the people and the use of every legal means by the state to protect the rights of the state against unconstitutional edicts of the U.S. Supreme Court.

"First, we will stand on the provisions of our state constitution. When the U.S. Supreme Court strikes that down, then we will start assignments under the Gore Act, which is perfectly constitutional law. Should that fail, we can adopt a school on the local option plan, get it out of the clutches of the Federal Courts, and immediately re-establish it with a new set of trustees."

Governor J.P. Coleman signed a bill repealing the compulsory school attendance laws - a move to protect the state integration cases. The bill was proposed by the Legal Education Advisory Committee, set up to find ways to evade the U.S. Supreme Court decisions outlawing segregation in schools. Members argued last year that the state would have firmer legal standing in integration cases if it did not require children - Negro and white - to attend school.

"Governor Coleman will immediately invoke the constitutional authority to close any school at which integration appears imminent, leaving empty classrooms into which troops could march Negro children.

Governor J. P. Coleman hinted today he may seek a change in the way Mississipians are registered to vote as a part of the State's defense against civil rights legislation. The governor told the Calhoun City Rotary Club he may ask that the registration function be taken from the circuit clerks under the new constitution he hopes to have written. Instead, three-man commission or board would meet at a regular time once a month to accept registrations.

February 4, 1958, p. 1. The Clarion-Ledger.

Voter Registration in Mississippi would be taken out of the hands of circuit clerks and given county election commissioners and examiners under a measure introduced by Representatives David Glass and John Glayton of Attala county. Their resolution bore the notation "by request," which means they acted at the request of someone else.

Attorney General J.P. Coleman, as the next governor of Mississippi, will recommend to the 1956 Legislature that the common-law marriage in the state be outlawed. The action would be directed toward the continuing of segregation in the schools of the state and would be a part of several facts of the overall state plan to defeat efforts of the NAACP and the Supreme Court of United States to break down racial discrimination.

Governor J. P. Coleman told a joint assembly of the Mississippi Legislature here Tuesday morning that the only way to successfully handly onslaughts of integrationists is through a constitutional convention. Thus, he renewed his claim that only a completely new basic formula of law will maintain segregation in this state.

Coleman said the governors of Virginia, Georgia and South Carolina agreed with him that they should let the nation know "in no uncertain terms that the Supreme Court ban on segregation is unconstitutional and that we will oppose it with every legal means available."

Coleman announced the State Textbook Commission has completed work on the list of books approved for high school during the next four years.

Coleman, a member of the five-man group, said,"We have done our best to select the best books available and have carefully checked them all as to content.

Before the group of books went before the group, every one was examined by a committee of teachers, who screened out material that might be construed as for integration.

He was bodily removed from the premises and held incommunicado for two weeks by highway patrolmen. On June 6 he was committed to Whitfield State Mental Hospital for a period of observation to last a minimum of thirty days. These and other acts succeeded in intimidating Professor King not only to forego further attempts at registration, but to leave the state entirely.

(15b) On September 15, 1959, close to the end of Governor Coleman's tenure of the governorship, another Negro, Clyde Kennard, attempted registering at an all-white Mississippi state college and suffered a tragic and fatal treatment at the hands of the Coleman administration. STATEMENT OF THOMAS I. EMERSON, LINES PROFESSOR OF LAW, YALE LAW SCHOOL, BEFORE THE SUB-COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE CONSIDERING THE NOMINATION OF GOV. JAMES P. COLEMAN TO THE COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT, JULY 12, 1965

I join with those opposing the confirmation of Gov. Coleman. My two main reasons can be stated briefly.

First, solution of the difficult problems of race relations in the United States today turns in major part upon the perfomance of the Federal judiciary system. The basic principles of racial equality, as embodied in the Constitution, have been enunciated by the Supreme Court. The overriding issue now is the implementation of those principles. This is the prime function of the Federal district and circuit courts. Unless they perform this function wholeheartedly and effectively we will have a rule of chaos rather than a rule of law. Such an outcome would be disastrous for the nation. It would particularly be a calamity for the South.

Second, Gov. Coleman's public record on segregation is such that the country can have no confidence that he will perform his judicial function adequately or impartially. The point is not that Gov. Coleman is a segregationist. Every one is entitled to his own opinion. The point is that Gov. Coleman has publicly made clear his view that the Constitution and laws of the United States pertaining to segregation should be resisted to the utmost. He is entitled to that position also. But he is not entitled to maintain that position and at the same time occupy a post in the Federal judiciary, whose duty it is to uphold and firmly enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Today the whole question whether this country can solve its racial problem by orderly judicial process hangs in the balance. The Brown decision is 11 years old. But in large part the schools of the South are still segregated. Congress has passed three civil rights acts in the last nine years. But less than 10 per cent of the adult Negroes are registered to vote in Mississippi. We cannot continue at this pace much longer. In my view we are close to national suicide if we appoint men to the Federal bench who have not, by their public record, given clear evidence that they are fully committed to support the Constitution and laws guaranteeing racial equality.

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN JOHN CONYERS, JR.
First District - Michigan on nomination of J.P. Coleman of Mississippi to Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals before Senate Judiciary Subcommittee

Monday morning, July 12, 1965

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee:

I strongly oppose the appointment of James P. Coleman to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Let me make it quite clear at the outset that my opposition is in no way based on personal feelings since I have never met Mr. Coleman nor have I ever had any dealings with him, directly or indirectly. I oppose his nomination because he is a dedicated and effective segregationist who has consistently used his great legal skills to subvert federal court decisions and laws passed by Congress enforcing the Constitutional guarantees of equal justice for all regardless of race. It is incredible to me that the architect of the Mississippi laws of the 1950's designed to thwart federal civil rights legislation should now be appointed to the federal court handling most of the crucial civil rights cases in this country. As Mr. Coleman stated in June, 1959, "I am not entitled to be called a moderate," but instead claimed to be a "successful segregationist." In a phrase that Mr. Coleman much favors for describing himself, he is not an "amateur or a hothead," but instead a calculating legal technician adept at manipulating the judicial process in order to protect a racist social order.

As a member of the Congress which is now trying to pass an effective law guaranteeing the right to vote, I am very concerned that our Southern Federal Judges, particularly on the Courts of Appeals, be dedicated to the upholding of the United States Constitution and to equality for all men, regardless of color. But the most carefully drafted laws are meaningless if interpreted by judges opposed to them. Mr. Coleman has been quite successful at "plowing around" the paramount rules of the United States, as he himself boasted in August, 1963. Appointing him to the Court which has such complete control over the federal judiciary in the South and which is the court of last resort for most cases would make it incredibly easy for him.

My position has been well stated by the Southern Regional Council in a resolution passed at its 1964 Meeting on November 20 and 21: "It is our strong conviction that only men of the highest professional competence and the fullest devotion to the declared principles of the Constitution should be charged with the judicial responsibility of enforcing federal laws in the South. It is our further conviction that no appointment contrary to these qualifications, however strongly urged by State or Congressional spokesmen, can satisfy the new politics of the South. In a situation where plain talk is desirable, we would report as plainly as we can that the progressive leadership of the South both Negro and white, would find the appointment or promotion of any judge of well-authenticated segregationist views to be a severe blow to regional, national and democratic interests."

The crucial nature of this appointment is illustrated by the fact that the Circuit Court Judge from a State normally sits as a member of the three-judge court considering the Constitutionality of a state statute. Following that practice, Mr. Coleman will presumably sit as a member of the three-judge court which will re-hear the case of U.S. vs Mississippi which tests the Constitutionality of the very election laws supported and drafted by Mr. Coleman as Attorney-General and then governor.

If the Mississippi political system does not permit anyone better then J.P. Coleman to be appointed to the Fifth Circuit it would be far better for that seat to remain vacant. The absence of a vote is far better than a vote to uphold racial segregation.

In 1959, Mr. Coleman asked that the people of Mississippi ignore the statements of his political enemies and just look at the record. Examining Mr. Coleman's record of public statements and actions as a public official is just what I have done for the past week. In order that no one should question the source of my evidence, I have exclusively used the past issues of the Jackson Clarion-Ledger which is the largest newspaper in the State of Mississippi and is designated by the Legislature for the printing of official State notices. I feel sure the chairman will attest to the fact that the Clarion-Ledger is not an advocate of racial integration and so liable to pervert Mr. Coleman's statements.

I have grouped my excerpts from the Clarion-Ledger into three sections describing Mr. Coleman's general political position, his attitude towards the judicial process and an incident from his public record which shows his disregard for equal justice under law. Whenever possible I have used direct quotes of Mr. Coleman's. With me I have a thick sheaf of other quotations from the Clarion-Ledger which will prove that the quotations I have selected are not isolated examples.

J.P. Coleman: "Successful Segregationist" not a "Moderate"

June 30, 1959 (excerpt from a television speech by Coleman): "I am well aware that a little handful of my political adversaries have tried to destroy my place in the affections of my fellow Mississippians by claiming that I am a 'moderate'. Apparently, these people cannot tell a moderate from a successful segregationist ... I ask you to ignore what they say and look at what the record says ... I stand on a record of performance and I have delivered the goods. I am not entitled to be called a moderate, and I notice that none of my friends have called me that."

Much has been said about Mr Coleman's endorsement of the Kennedy-Johnson ticket in 1960 as proof of his political moderation. I would first of all point out that Senators Eastland and Stennis supported the Kennedy-Johnson ticket and no one has ever claimed that they were moderates on the race issue. In fact Mr. Coleman has made it very clear why he supported the national Democratic party ticket in 1960: "Coleman said rumoured attempts to purge Eastland because Mississippi bolted the Democratic Party in the 1960 election was the main reason he supported the party ticket in that election." (June 12, 1963). And again on July 10, 1963: "We're sorry now for the things Kennedy has done, but we saved Senator Eastland's Judiciary Committee chairmanship and we're glad of that. That chairmanship is the major bulwark between us and Kennedy's civil rights bill."

Coleman: The Thinking Man's Segregationist

Governor Coleman is a renowned strategist at by-passing the federal judiciary and devising legal tecniques to thwart the series of laws passed by Congress to protect the civil rights of all Americans regardless of race. Throughout his public statements runs a consistent theme: he is the only person with the legal experience and skill to consistently out-manuver the Federal courts, Congress and the Executive.

Speaking about the school integration decision by the Supreme Court when he was the incumbent Attorney-General running for Governor (June 28, 1955): "We have already planned our strategy. First, we will stand on the provisions of our State Constitution. When the U.S. Supreme Court strikes that down, then we will start assignment under the Gore Act which is perfectly Constitutional law. Should that fail, we can adopt a school on the local option plan, get it out of the clutches of the Federal Courts, and immediately re-establish it with a new set of trustees."

October 14, 1956: "He (Coleman) told them of new laws most of which he wrote as Attorney-General and then signed when his people promoted him to governor -- to keep Negroes out of white schools. They include authority for the legislature to abolish public schools." For the benefit of the Committee the laws referred to are from the General Laws of Mississippi of 1956. Chapter 228, signed by Governor Coleman on February 24, 1956, repealed the compulsory school attendance laws, thus allowing parents to withdraw their children from school in the event of school desegregation. Chapter 273, signed by Governor Coleman on April 5, 1956 provided, "In all school districts, separate schools shall be maintained or otherwise provided for children of the white and colored races." I would point out that this law was passed nearly two years after the Brown vs. Board of Education case in which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the racial segregation of public school pupils.

Mr. Coleman is also smart enough to know when to make a tactical retreat. A year and a half after signing into law the authority for the legislature to abolish public schools, he advocated repeal because the legislative history of the bill would have been quite embarrassing in a court case. The November 19, 1957 Clarion-Ledger reported: "He (Coleman) said Mississippi's Constitutional authority to abolish schools should be removed because legislative journals show 'the clear purpose of that amendment was to preserve segregation to the last ditch and then abolish the schools as a last resort '"

June 21, 1957: "It would be utterly impossible to integrate the schools of any State or this State now, if the State will take the right legal approach.

August 31, 1957: "Asked today if he thought the civil rights legislation would result in any increase in Negro voting in Mississippi, the governor said: 'That all depends on a lot of things. It does not necessarily follow that more would vote, although it could follow through a lack of management and preparation.' He said that with the defense he outlined and 'certain very necessary changes in the Constitution, the people of Mississippi will escape any substantial injury from this federal legislation.'"

July 10, 1963: "Former Governor J.P. Coleman said Tuesday his opponents have taken a defeatist attitude on the race issue ... Coleman said he is the only candidate 'with hope of stemming widespread integration and the ability and experience to do it.'"

August 1, 1963: "Coleman said that sovereignity can be maintained peacefully. 'But not by knocking over the paramount rules of the United States. You just have to learn how to plow around them.'" case of Clennon King: Shows Willingness to Sacrifice Individual to Political Expediency.

The case of Clennon King, an Alcorn A&M College history professor, who attempted to enroll at the University of Mississippi in the summer of 1958, demonstrates Mr. Coleman's willingness to sacrifice one individual's Constitutional rights to the dictates of political expediency.

Let me quote the article from the Clarion-Ledger of August 3, 1963 reporting Mr. Coleman's boasts about the incident "Coleman repeated the story about Negro Clennon King who attempted to register at Ole' Miss during Coleman's tenure as Governor, but who was committed to Whitfield after two weeks after being held incommunicado for some time by highway patrolmen. 'The point of this story,' he said, 'is not the fact that one man was kept out of Ole' Miss. Rather it shows that we know how to protect your rights in such a way that the federal government could find no excuse for putting hands on the State of Mississippi.'"

I certainly agree with Mr. Coleman's assessment of the true significance of this incident. It demonstrates the cavalier attitude of Mr. Coleman to basic civil rights when opposed by the imperative of maintaining racial segregation. Mr. Coleman used incident as a major campaign issue in his campaign for re-election to demonstrate his ability to maintain racial segregation in Mississippi public schools for the next four years

March 17, 1963: "'The only racial trouble in this state from 1956 to 1960 was when Negro Clennon King decided he wanted to go to Ole' Miss. He went in the front door and out the back door to another State institution. He decided then he wanted to leave the State, and he hasn't been back since.'". The Clarion-Ledger of June 7, 1958 reported how it was that Clennon King was committed to the State mental institution at Whitfield: "Examination by two Hinds County doctors was ordered by Chancery Clerk Frank Scott following a statement by Governor J.P. Coleman who declared King 'went berserk' during his attempt at entry to the University Thursday."

Conclusion: Coleman Unfit to Sit on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals

Mr. Coleman has never been a dissembler nor a trimmer. His political promises and campaign oratory have been reflected in his actions while in office. He has made it clear to all that he is a firm, consistent and able advocate of racial segregation. The Supreme Court, the Congress and the Executive Branch have all declared in the clearest possible terms that public racial segregation is unconstitutional and violates the spirit of American democracy. Surely we can no longer afford to appoint federal judges who have demonstrated their fundamental disagreement with this view of the Constitution and who have used their talents, experience and influence -- no matter how great those may be -- to subverting Supreme Court decisions and the Acts of Congress.

Statement of Louis Lusky, Professor of Law
Columbia Law School, New York City

On the Appointment of James P. Coleman to the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals

Before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee

My name is Louis Lusky. I live in Ridgewood, New Jersey. I am a professor of law at Columbia Law School in New York City.

This subcommittee is sitting to hear facts bearing on the fitness of James P. Coleman of Mississippi to sit as a judge of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. This is an important public question because the Fifth Circuit includes the Deep Southern States which have most successfully resisted the enforcement of Federal law in civil rights matters, and in which the Federal district courts have shown most reluctance to enforce the mandates of Congress and the Supreme Court. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, over the past ten years particularly, has performed a uniquely important service. It has, on the whole applied the Federal law as Congress and the Supreme Court have directed it to be applied. By reversing dozens if not hundreds of persistently erroneous district court rulings, it has screened the Supreme Court from a crushing case load which might well have swamped it if it had been compelled to take jurisdiction of these myriad appeals in order to prevent judicial nullification of the Federal law. The role of the court, and its performance, are assessed in a comprehensive study entitled "Judicial Performance in the Fifth Circuit," which appeared in the November, 1963 issue of the Yale Law Journal.

The responsibility involved in confirming Mr. Coleman's appointment is a heavy one. If confirmed, he can sit on this court for the rest of his life. The Senate has one opportunity, and only one, to make a judgment as to whether he is likely to aid or obstruct the proper functioning of the Court.

In making that judgment, the Senate will of course consider Mr. Coleman's previous acts and statements in so far as they bear on his acceptance of his obligation, as a lawyer and a public official, to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States. But there are two particular points on which especially careful inquiry is justified. First, what is his attitude toward an oath of office? Does he respect it and consider it binding upon him, or does he subordinate it to some higher loyalty? Second, is he a competent lawyer? Does he have the legal skills that are required for satisfactory service on a court outranked only by the Supreme Court itself?

Since I have been asked to be brief, I shall confine my attention to one particular item in Mr. Coleman's record, which seems to me to raise very grave questions on at least one of these two scores. It concerns the interposition effort which he helped to devise in 1955, and which the Mississippi legislature, with his encouragement and full approval as Governor, adopted in 1956.

Interposition means the refusal of a State to recognize the validity of a Federal law unless and until it is confirmed by adoption of a new constitutional amendment. There was once a time when it was possible for a competent lawyer to believe that it was a lawful procedure. But that time passed a century or more ago. Interposition was proposed by John C. Calhoun in the early 1830's, in an effort to nullify the protective tariff. South Carolina attempted to put it into effect. President Andrew Jackson sternly repulsed this attack on the supremacy of Federal law. His message to Congress on January 16, 1833 (Misc. Doc. of the House of Rep. for 2nd Sess. of 53rd Cong., Vol. 37, Pt. (2) (1893-1894), p. 610) points out the many reasons why interposition cannot be good law. And he proceeded to make his position good. Any lingering doubts as to the soundness of his position were resolved by the Civil War, and by several clear decisions of the Supreme Court. Since that time it has not been possible for a competent lawyer to believe that interposition is or can be constitutionally permissible.

When Mr. Coleman was elected governor in 1955, he presumably took the oath prescribed by Section 268 of the Mississippi Constitution, which included an undertaking that he would "faithfully support the Constitution of the United States." On January 24, 1956, however -- according to a signed news article in the New York Times of the following day (a photocopy of which is submitted as an exhibit to my testimony) -- he joined with three other Southern governors in proposing interposition to prevent enforcement of the Supreme Court's school segregation rulings. The following month the Mississippi legislature adopted an interposition resolution (Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 125, adopted by both houses on February 29, 1956) which declared the school segregation decisions to be "a usurpation of power xxx and therefore xxx invalid and of no lawful effect within the confines of the State of Mississippi." A photocopy of this resolution, taken from the official Mississippi session laws, is submitted as an exhibit to my testimony. The State legislature then proceeded to enact a comprehensive series of statutes designed to implement this unlawful effort to nullify the Federal law, including one (Chapter 254, Miss. Gen. Laws 1956) which required the entire executive branch of the State government and every local government to "give full force and effect xxx to the Resolution of Interposition" and "to prohibit, by any lawful, peaceful and constitutional means, the implementation of or the compliance with the Integration Decisions of the United States Supreme Court of May 17, 1954 (347 U.S. 483 xxx) and of May 31, 1955 (349 U.S. 294 xxx) xxx (or) of any orders, rules or regulations of any board, commission or agency of the Federal government, based on the supposed authority of said Integration Decisions xxx" Governor Coleman approved this statute on April 5, 1956.

This interposition program was intended to mobilize the entire establishment of State and local government to prevent enforcement of the equal protection clause in Mississippi. It had the desired effect. For nearly ten years officials have arrested, prosecuted, and otherwise harassed those who claimed their Federal rights in Mississippi. They are still doing it. The gap between the possession of Federal rights and the enjoyment of those rights in Mississippi is measured by the cost and suffering involved in arrest, imprisonment, and years of wearisome litigation.

A word should be said about the terms "lawful" and "peaceful" as used in the interposition legislation. It has been quite clear for at least the last hundred years that there is no lawful way in which interposition can be implemented. As used in this context, "lawful" can only mean "not violative of the criminal law," and "peaceful" must mean "not involving armed insurrection." The actual practice of the Mississippi government over the past decade shows that the terms "lawful" and peaceful" were understood to be used in this peculiar and limited sense. But there are many effective non-criminal ways of defying the Supreme Court. One of the most effective is for a Federal judge to abuse his vast discretionary authority to that end. The Yale Law Journal comment which I have already mentioned, shows concretely how this can be and, to some extent, has been accomplished in the Fifth Circuit.

To nobody's surprise, the Federal Courts have flatly branded interposition as unconstitutional. Submitted herewith are photocopies of the opinion in Bush V. Orleans Parish School Board, 188 F. Supp. 916 (E.D. La 1960), and pertinent portions of the Supreme Court's opinion in Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958). Despite these decisions, the nullification effort in Mississippi has been remarkably effective -- and still is.

On the basis of his participation in the interposition effort, Mr. Coleman can rightly be asked these questions:

(1) Did he believe interposition was lawful when he proposed it?

(2) If so, does he still believe it?

(3) If he does not still believe it, what new law has he learned since 1956 that enlightened him on this point?

(4) Does he believe that his sponsorship of interposition was consistent with his oath as governor to support the Constitution of the United States?

(5) If so, would he place the same construction on his oath of office as a Federal judge? If he would consider such an oath to be more binding than his oath as governor, why?

It is hard to see how Mr. Coleman can give satisfactory answers to all these questions. If he does not, his confirmation would be hard to justify. Enactment of the Civil Rights Bill will mean little if the judges charged with its enforcement are in fact dedicated to its stiltification. Wolves are poor guardians for sheep.

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

The nomination of former Mississippi Governor J.P. Coleman to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has developed into one of the most controversial judicial nominations in recent years.

As you may know I testified against the nomination along with law professors and representatives of various civil rights, liberal and religious groups. As an attorney and as a member of Congress, I am concerned that we have a federal judiciary composed of men who faithfully uphold the Constitution and Supreme Court decisions. Mr. Coleman's long public record in Mississippi as a prosecuting attorney, attorney-general, and governor shows he will not bring to the bench a sincere willingness to implement the law of the land regarding racial desegregation.

As a prominent person concerned with the administration of justice, I thought you would be interested in reading some of the enclosed background material and statements presented to the Senate Judiciary subcommittee regarding this nomination.

I hope you might have the opportunity to share your views with me on this important matter.

Sincerely,

John Conyers, Jr.

My dear Mr. Congressman:

I was glad that Professor Louis Lusky suggested that you send me the background material on your good fight against the Coleman confirmation. I am afraid that I was on the side lines during the critical part of this fight, having been on vacation from July 10 to yesterday.

My interest in this subject was particularly sparked by my exasperation at the confirmation of Cox as District Judge for Mississippi without any recorded opposition at the committee hearing in 1961. The fight you led marks progress since that date. You may be interested in my article in The Common Weal, entitled "Wait Till Next Year", pointing up the Southern Federal Courts' judicial obstructionism and suggesting a remedy. (I still do not know of any remedy short of the one suggested in my article that will really put an end to tokenism; as I wrote my friend, Hoyt Fuller the other day, we are about to enter a period of "super-tokenism".)

You will be particularly interested in the letter my partner, Paul O'Dwyer wrote to the President on April 29, 1965, within a week after the death of Judge Sidney Mize. That letter was published in P. D. East's Petal Paper and thereby given more publicity by this courageous Southern-white integrationist than in the Northern-white liberal press media. Political observers, so-called, scoffed at Mr. O'Dwyer's suggestion of Mrs. Motley to fill the Mize vacancy. Now, I read that she may be designated to the Federal Circuit Court for the Second Circuit. I think that it would do a thousand times more good to have her or someone like her designated for the District Court in Mississippi. I have heard the name of Jack Young mentioned. If I know the press manipulation tactics used on high, the inspired talk of designation of Mrs. Motley for the Second Circuit is preparation to cover up a bad nomination for the Mize vacancy. Meanwhile, every day that the Mize vacancy remains unfilled, Judge Cox is the Sole representation of Federal Judicial power in Mississippi - a fact which should be mentioned, perhaps with asperity, on the House floor.

As to Judge Coleman, I have two suggestions, which you might want to consider: the first would be a rider to the Justice Department appropriation bill providing that no part of the funds appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of any judge who has by his public pronouncements indicated that he took his oath of office with mental reservations as to his support of the Constitution of the United States and each of its Amendments.

One final thought: when Paul O'Dwyer was campaigning last year for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator from New York, he publicly advocated the impeachment of Judge Harold Cox. I would recommend, since the House Judiciary Committee would initiate any proceeding for the impeachment of a Federal District Judge, that your committee conduct at least a staff inquiry to determine whether grounds exist for his impeachment. I have seen attributed to Judge Cox the making of statements from the bench which demonstrate conclusively, to my satisfaction, that he should be impeached, and I have so informed my own Representative, the Hon. Herbert Tenzer, a member of your committee with whom you may want to consult on this subject.

With every good wish,

Respectfully,

enc.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN LEWIS, CHAIRMAN OF STUDENT NON-VIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE BEFORE THE SENATE JUDICIARY SUB-COMMITTEE ON THE APPOINTMENT OF JAMES P. COLEMAN TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee,

I am John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee. After just having been released a few days ago after ten days in the Jackson, Mississippi, jail, it is with a troubled mind that I come before this committee to testify against the appointment of J P. Coleman to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. I cannot stress too strongly the opposition of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee to this appointment and I feel that most Americans would join us if they could foresee the results which would ensue from this appointment. Moreover this appointment is an affront and an insult to the Negro people of the South and to all Americans of good will.

Since 1954 our Federal judicial system has been the primary force in preventing a level of violence and bloodshed which the South has not witnessed since the Civil War. We know all too well Mr. Coleman's attitude regarding the 1954 Supreme Court decision, for it was he who said as late as 1963 that if he were elected governor there would be no further integration of the public schools of Mississippi

Since 1957 the Senate has passed a lengthy series of acts which purport to eliminate centuries of racial discrimination aimed at American Negroes. Now this same body is considering naming James Plemon Coleman to the branch of the United States Courts which carries the heaviest load of civil rights litigation and holds a position of judicial power over the lives of millions of American Negroes second only to the United States Supreme Court. The results of this action may be predicted with certainty--a complete nullification of all the civil rights legislation which our Congress worked so hard to create.

Moreover this appointment can only result in the retarding of the growth of full citizenship for American Negroes, a policy which I feel neither this committee nor the United States Senate wishes to embrace. Furthermore if the United States Senate chooses to consent to this appointment then it goes on record as favoring the perpetuation of segregation, and all American Negroes will know once and for all just where this body stands on the racial issue. If this body wishes to eliminate or make ineffective past legislation, let it do so by outright repeal so that the American Negro knows where he stands. If this body wishes to ignore the years of suffering, of death, and of dingy prison cells that the Negro has had to face then let it confirm the appointment of J. P. Coleman. But on the other hand, if this body wishes to insure the enforcement of civil rights legislation then it has only one course of action to follow--refuse to consent to the appointment of J. P. Coleman, a vicious and clever segregationist.

If anyone in this room questions the truth of these charges, I direct his attention to the laws of the state of Mississippi which were passed during the period in which J. P. Coleman was governor of Mississippi and over his signature.

We of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee feel that the record of James P. Coleman speaks for itself as a record of race hatred, prejudice and defiance of the United States Constitution, the Supreme Court and Congress. I would like to point out that as a United States judge, Mr. Coleman would be called upon to interpret the Constitution, laws of Congress and Supreme Court decisions. In light of his past actions can anyone question the result or the course that he would take?

I would like to make it crystal clear to this committee that we reject the argument that Mr. Coleman is the best that Mississippi has to offer. When is it that justice is based on the lesser of two evils? We also feel it is morally wrong for the President to appoint Mr. Coleman as a political pay-off for Mr. Coleman's work during the 1960 Kennedy-Johnson campaign. Furthermore we reject the argument that Mr. Coleman has changed his views. For during the 1963 gubernatorial campaign, Mr. Coleman's position was basically the same as his 1957 stand when he ran for Governor. Therefore we would rather see the seat remain vacant, for fair-minded judges from throughout America are now filling that vacancy.

Gentlemen, the issues are very clear—Negro citizens of this nation cannot and will not stand idly by while one of their major forums for seeking redress is eliminated. I feel obligated to put this committee and our nation on notice that the appoinment of this outspoken segregationist is such a denial of justice that it may cause Negro citizens of the deep South, many of whom we work with every day, to lose faith in the judicial process. They may be forced, in the name of freedom, to carry on mass social dislocation and civil disobedience throughout the South. Gentlemen, the decision is yours. Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF MRS. VICTORIA J. GRAY, ON BEHALF OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, MISSISSIPPI FREEDOM DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee,

I am Mrs. Victoria Gray and I represent the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party which has a membership of more than 100,000 adults of Mississippi. It is with unbelieving and indescribable shock and fear that we learned Friday a week ago of the tragic nomination of former Governor James P. Coleman of Mississippi to be a judge on the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. The man who designed and implemented much of the legislative system which still enslaves us, has now been appointed our judge. This man has spent almost all of his adult life advising and planning in one way or another how to continue the suppression and dehumanization of the Negro people of Mississippi. He did this as district attorney, as judge on the Mississippi Supreme Court, as Attorney General, as Governor,and as representative to the State Legislature. His record is complete, is so extensive that it encompasses almost every type of office in Mississippi and is so consistent with segregation and white supremacy that it is inconceivable that rational men could believe that this man would be an unbiased judge over the rights of the Negro citizens of the states of the Fifth Circuit.

Gentlemen, I have lived in Mississippi for the many years that this man has been a dominant force in the state. I have personally experienced a life that has suffered from his brilliant and able fight for the supremacy of the white man. Senators, I now wish to speak of a matter of which I have personal knowledge, the tragic case of Clyde Kennard, a brilliant Negro ex-serviceman whose initial efforts to get an education in a state institution of higher learning took place during the ex-Governor Coleman's administration. Ex-Governor Coleman gave Mr. Kennard his personal assurance that if he would wait until after the gubernatorial elections had been held he would be able to continue his education at Mississippi Southern College. Mr. Kennard accepted ex-Governor Coleman's proposal in good faith and after the election had been held, he again attempted to enter. At this time he was arrested on leaving the registration building. He was not informed of the charges until after he had been locked up. The arrest was followed by a withdrawal of his credit which was especially serious for him as he was a poultry farmer. Finally he was arrested and sentenced to seven years in the state penitentiary on the false charges of instigating the theft of seven bags of chicken feed. Kennard was denied access to medical treatment even though the medical officials had instructed that he must not be made to do hard labor, which he was forced to do, and that he should receive periodic medical treatment. Kennard was not given treatment for cancer until just before he was granted a suspended sentence. Kennard died within a few weeks. I do not know what part ex-Governor Coleman played in the final series of events which led to Kennard's death, but it was his agreement with Kennard which triggered these events.

This Congress has indicated its deep concern for enforcing the precious right to vote for those whose sole disqualification has been the color of their skin. This was the promise of the Fifteenth Amendment nearly one hundred years ago. And this is the purpose of the Challenge to the seats of the Mississippi Congressmen, who sit by virtue of the nearly total exclusion of Negro citizens from the registration rolls of my state. Their disfranchisement has been accomplished in part by intimidation, terror, violence, and murder, and in part by legal trickery. Governor Coleman as the author and architect of much of the latter, the Kennard case for example, is intimately familiar with these legal devices.

He formed the notorious State Sovereignty Commission, whose purpose is the preservation of the white supremacist system. It is supported on state funds, and has donated $193,000 of the money to underwrite the activities of the White Citizens Councils. He helped to organize the Southern governors for the achievement of these same racist goals on a region-wide basis. He signed into law Mississippi's interposition statute, thus codifying a doctrine which is wholly in opposition to the American system of federalism, and Article VI, the Supremacy Clause, of the Constitution. The statute directs the executive branch of the Mississippi State Government to decide for itself whether it wishes to comply with Supreme Court desegregation orders. The absurdity of such a notion speaks for itself, and requires no further comment on my part.

Governor Coleman's official actions are a matter of public record. I would like now to turn to a lesser known aspect of his lack of qualifications for the position to which he has been named. It must always be borne in mind that as a judge on the Court of Appeals he will stand in the pathway of the successful implementation of the Voting Rights Bill, for the passage of which this Senate labored mightily, and the Negroes of Mississippi and elsewhere await with high expectations. For that bill provides that when the federal voting examiner registers qualified applicants, the state has a right to appeal the registration of those persons. To avoid the injustice Negroes have received at the hands of district judges such as Cox of Mississippi, this appeal is taken directly to the circuit court, that is directly to, I fear, Judge Coleman. It is intolerable that a man who has taken the public position that Negroes should not have the right to vote, will sit in judgment on the qualifications of Negroes who must go to a federal registrar because Governor Coleman's registration laws have made it impossible for them to meet the rigid standards of state registration officials.

But allow me to tell you now what sort of a man we have found Governor Coleman to be, what sort of a man we may find sitting on one of the highest and most dignified appointive offices in the United States. You are probably familiar with the Challenge in the House of Representatives. Governor Coleman has been retained as attorney for the four Democratic sitting members. As such he entered into certain stipulations regarding technical requirements for the taking of depositions. In reliance upon these agreements over 15,000 pages of testimony were gathered. But on June 8, B. B. McClendon, attorney for Republican Representative Walker, wrote to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on behalf of Governor Coleman and himself. In the letter he urged that the Clerk disregard the stipulations and refuse to print the testimony. The lower House of this Congress has dealt with such behavior in the past, in an election contest involving the seat of Fiorello LaGuardia. When his attorney disregarded stipulations as to the time limits for collecting testimony, and argued in his brief that the depositions taken in reliance upon those stipulations were invalid, the House Elections Committee said:

> ". . .(T)he contestee's attorney joined in the stipulation to waive the requirements of the law,. . . and was afterwards guilty of a breach of legal ethics when he raised the point of lack of diligence."

The Canons of Professional Ethics say that a lawyer's conduct should be characterized by "candor adn fairness" and that " it is dishonorable to avoid performance of any agreement" affecting clients' rights. Governor Coleman's apparent role in repudiating stipulations and agreements made with the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party constitutes professional conduct that is highly questionable from an ethical point of view. It raises the gravest apprehensions as to his suitability to assume a position of highest honor. I, for one, am compelled to speak out against his appointment. Many others have joined me in this protest, for they share my alarm and concern. I cannot emphasize too strongly that this Senate should refuse to approve his nomination, for to give consent to it will be an affront to the judiciary of the United States, and an insult of the grossest nature to the hopes and aspirations of Negroes who for the first time in this century see the prospect of equality and full freedom within their reach.

I repeat that Governor Coleman's official actions are a matter of public record and would close this testimony with a quote taken from a television speech made by Governor Coleman: (Jackson, Clarion-Ledger, June 30, 1959)

"I am well aware that a little handful of my political adversaries have tried to destroy my place in the affections of my fellow Mississippians by claiming that I am a 'moderate.' Apparently, these people cannot tell a moderate from a successful segregationist. They have made a great sham of this, and every time they can get a chance they try to stir it up. I ask you to ignore what they say and look at what the record says. . . I stand on a record of performance and I have delivered the goods. I am not entitled to be called a moderate, and I notice that none of my friends have called me that."

These, Gentlemen, are some of the words and acts of the man who has been nominated to occupy a position that by its nature demands the implementation of the very rights he himself has done a near perfect job of destroying, both for the Negro and for a large portion of the white population of our state of Mississippi. We feel that confirmation of Mr. Coleman will be no less than sanction of continued police state for Mississippi and the states of the Fifth Circuit.

I thank you.

TESTIMONY ON THE APPOINTMENT OF FORMER MISSISSIPPI GOVERNOR J. P. COLEMAN TO THE U.S. FIFTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS:

My name is Richard T. McSorley. My address is 37th & O Street, Washington 7, D. C. I am a Roman Catholic priest and professor of theology at Georgetown University.

A review of the public speeches and actions of former Governor Coleman show him to be fully committed to the practice of color segregation and discrimination. In his Inaugural Address as Governor, January 1956, he said;

> "My own personal and official attitude toward this question is well known to all Mississippians. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1955, I said in my official platform: There will be no mixing of the races in any of the state-operated educational institutions. I already have a record on this subject."

He lived up to his promise. He led in the fight to deny Negro citizens the educational opportunity, voting rights. His public life is the story of striving to deny civil rights to Negro Americans in Mississippi. I present with my testimony thirty two pages of information on the public speeches and actions of Mr. Coleman that will substantiate this statement.

The judge is the official guardian of justice in the area of his jurisdiction. To commit the care of justice to a man who has in all his public actions exemplified a public pattern of injustice toward the Negro is, I think, morally wrong, unless there is some proof that the public pattern of injustice will cease. It is morally wrong because it promotes and rewards injustice.

Official statements of the Jewish, Protestant and Roman Catholic religions have condemned the practice of color segregation and discrimination in the United States as morally wrong.

Pope John 23rd in his encyclical letter, "Peace on Earth" , "Racial discrimination can in no way be justified ..." (sec. 44) and "Truth requires the elimination of every trace of racism. (sec. 86)

Because the practice of racial segregation and discrimination in the way it was publicly practised by former Governor J. P. Coleman show him to be opposed in practice to sound moral teaching, I do not think he should become the judge who is to decide the civil rights issue in the sensitive area of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Fifth Circuit encompasses the two worst states in the nation in terms of denial of civil rights, Mississippi and Alabama. Many of the important decisions based on the Civil Rights Bill of 1964 and the coming Voting Rights Bill of 1965 will be made in the Fifth Circuit Court. The record of former Governor Coleman does not qualify him to make such decisions. I express the hope that you will not confirm his appointment.

Suffrage - Miss.

lution introduced for this purpose. My distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] and other Senators joined me as coauthors. That joint resolution was reintroduced on the opening day for receiving resolutions and bills in the present Congress.

Mr. President, the facts are that on July 23, 1962, only a short time before the joint resolution was introduced in this Chamber by me and cosponsored by my colleague [Mr. LAUSCHE] and other Senators, the Plain Dealer, a great newspaper in Cleveland, Ohio, and in our Nation, published an excellent article on Winston Churchill. The article was entitled, "Hero of Two Nations." Its author was Kay Halle.

Miss Halle is one of the outstanding women in the United States. She is a personable television and radio commentator, a journalist, an author, and a world traveler of note. Not only is she at the present time one of the world's outstanding women, but also during World War II she served her country in an executive capacity in the Office of Strategic Services. In recent years she has been serving the administration as a member of President Kennedy's Advisory Committee on the Arts.

Miss Halle, of Cleveland, Ohio, first met Winston Churchill in 1931. At that time she was writing a column from London for the Cleveland News. During her stay in England in the following years, she spent many weekends at Chartwell with the Churchill family. She recalled those years, 30 years later, in her article published in the Plain Dealer.

In that article she wrote of the contribution and the service which Winston Churchill had rendered to his nation, to the United States and, in fact, to all the nations of the free world. She suggested that it would be fitting if the President of the United States, under an act of Congress, should bestow upon Winston Churchill honorary citizenship of this country.

When the word goes out from Washington that the President of the United States has issued such a proclamation—and it will be issued very shortly, due to the authorization by both bodies of the Congress—it will be a fitting honor, and, I fear, one of the final honors which will come to this great citizen of the world.

I invite attention, Mr. President, to the fact that although many resolutions have been introduced in both bodies to confer honorary citizenship upon Winston Churchill, we should recall at this time that Kay Halle of Ohio was the person who first suggested that this be done.

We can all take some satisfaction that this action, without precedent in the history of our country, has taken place; and that, in his final days on this earth, Winston Churchill, former Prime Minister of England, former leader of the free world, is an honorary citizen of the United States.

Mr. LAUSCHE and Mr. DIRKSEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield first to my distinguished senior colleague.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I merely wish to commend my colleague for the beautiful remarks he has made with respect to Sir Winston Churchill. I was glad to join him in sponsorship of the measure. I am prouder now, knowing that the objective is reaching its achievement, to be a sponsor along with him of this very fine measure. I commend him for the remarks he has made.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should afford full credit to the distinguished Senators from Ohio and West Virginia for having introduced the measures in the Senate.

I was directed by the Committee on the Judiciary this morning to report the House bill and ask for its passage, because the Senate bill carried a preamble. Since there was a variance as between texts, the Senate bill would have had to go to conference. Time was of the essence. Therefore, we submitted the House version, and the bill was passed today.

I am deeply grateful to my friend from Ohio for having taken cognizance of this matter quite some time ago.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. The distinguished minority leader has, from the beginning, been enthusiastic in his support of this measure, and all Americans can be grateful to him for the fact that, largely due to his leadership, this action was taken today.

The bill will go immediately to the White House, and very shortly Winston Churchill will be made an honorary citizen of the United States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Yes, indeed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Since the Constitution of the United States allows for no titles of nobility, I think the record ought to show that, here, he will be Mr. Winston Churchill.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I agree. Like the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I have no truck with titles of nobility.

THE SITUATION IN GREENWOOD, MISS.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly concerning the situation at Greenwood, Miss., largely a factual statement, and I prefer not to yield until I have finished my brief statement, at which time I shall be glad to yield.

The public statements about the situation at Greenwood made by outside agitators and picked up and circulated by the newspapers, radio, and television, have painted a very unfair and wholly misleading picture.

I am not saying the newspapers gave slanted accounts—certainly not all of them—but the statements themselves were slanted, and as reflected through this medium, gave a very unfair and wholly misleading picture. Also, these statements are an unjust vilification of the fine people and public officials of Greenwood and Leflore County.

The facts are simple. The people of Greenwood are the innocent victims of organized pressure groups imported into Greenwood from outside Mississippi, hundreds and thousands of miles away. Under the guise of assisting the local Negro people in registering to vote, these professional troublemakers have organized one of the most bitter hate campaigns ever devised in this country. In conducting these meetings, they have gone out of their way to flaunt their organized mobs and publicize their intentions to secure the widest possible public notice and to create all possible resentment. In short, they have purposely inflamed the public mind, through their meetings, their organized mob marches on the courthouse, and their wild charges and speeches. They have misled not only the local Negroes they profess to be assisting, but they have misled the people of the Nation into believing there is a wholesale effort on the part of local city and county officials to prevent the local Negroes from registering to vote.

The fact, however, is that the circuit clerk, Mrs. Martha Turner Lamb, a fine public official, has received the applications for registration offered by those who presented themselves.

If I may add a statement at this point, it should not be in order for mobs of people to congregate and push themselves as a group into the office of any public official, much less the office of a lady public official; and it should not be in order to do so anywhere, and make immediate demands on the lady official, or any other official, so far as that is concerned, for immediate mass attention and immediate favorable response to their requests, whatever they may be. If we have reached the point where that is the rule to be followed, we have reached the point where we no longer have law and government.

Those found by Mrs. Lamb to be qualified for registration, according to the laws of the State of Mississippi, have been registered. The office of the circuit clerk, the registrar, is open each day. Each day, a number of qualified applicants have been registered. Last week, during 1 day alone, I am advised that 50 Negro applicants were actually registered to vote.

I do not know that all 50 had applied that day—there has to be an examination—but I am told that at least that many were put on the rolls that day. Others registered as late as yesterday.

Of course, the law does not permit any organized group, white or Negro, to form in the middle of a public street in the business district of the city of Greenwood, blocking, traffic and disturbing the peace and good order of the community, and march shouting to the courthouse, creating further violence every step of the way.

And of course, this is what the officials of the city of Greenwood have stopped. They have the legal duty and responsibility to maintain law and order, to quell disturbances, to keep traffic moving and to arrest those disturbing the peace. They have not interfered with an attempt of any person to enter the courthouse or the county registrar's office, individually or in small groups, to make an application to register to vote.

But, in the face of these facts, the Justice Department has filed a suit, with many requests for the court to enter orders against the local officials.

The Justice Department should stop its well-known practice of filing suits right and left whenever a member of some minority group makes an allegation unsupported by proof, and contrary to the facts. The Federal Government does not have a monopoly on protecting constitutional rights. Under the facts, it has no authority whatever in this matter in the city of Greenwood. Our State and local governments have the responsibility for maintaining law and order; and Greenwood, Miss., and Leflore County are doing this very thing under the most difficult circumstances.

The law-abiding citizens of a peaceful community like Greenwood rightfully look to their local public officials to maintain law and order and to protect them from unlawful invasions and breaches of the peace.

In connection with this very suit, I should like to turn briefly, not merely to what I might say about the situation, but to what Judge Claude F. Clayton said yesterday at the regular term of court in Mississippi, in passing on the application of the Justice Department for a temporary restraining order against these very officers I have been talking about.

Judge Clayton is one of the outstanding Federal judges in the entire Nation. I assure my colleagues that I know Judge Clayton personally, and have known him for a long time. He is an experienced, able judge. He had served on the bench before he was appointed a Federal judge. He is a man of firm convictions. He is resolute by nature. He has the greatest professional pride and also the highest judicial pride. He represents integrity on and off the bench.

As I have said, in hearing this matter yesterday, on a temporary basis, Judge Clayton very properly ruled that the request of the Justice Department was not sufficient to "warrant trampling on the rights" of these officials, and he refused to take any action pending a full hearing on the merits on Thursday of this week.

In announcing his action, Judge Clayton said:

> I detest any action on the part of anyone which interferes in any way with any right of any person which is given and protected by law.
> This includes the right to register and the right to vote, provided the standards now rightfully established by the laws of the State of Mississippi are met.
> These are the rights which belong to all of us. These are the rights which belong to the city of Greenwood, its officials and its police officers and to the officers of Leflore County.

Mayor Charles E. Sampson, of Greenwood, has rightfully announced his intention to keep law and order in Greenwood, Mayor Sampson and City Commissioners B. A. Hammond and W. G. Mize, Jr., have done an outstanding job in dealing with this most difficult situation.

The chief of police, Curtis Lary, has taken precautions to prevent breaches of the peace, and has repeatedly made a public announcement to these groups, as follows:

> Because of present public excitement resulting from recent events here, it is considered necessary to peace and order that no large organized groups be allowed on the streets of Greenwood. Therefore, you must disperse. If it is your purpose to go to the courthouse to apply for voter registration, you will not be prevented from doing so but in order to insure that there will be no breach of the peace you must proceed in smaller groups.

This is a step which is absolutely necessary in order to maintain law and order under the most difficult circumstances and tremendous provocation.

The real issue is whether unwanted and unwelcome outside organizers, vote peddlers and pressure groups will be permitted to invade a peaceful community for the sole purpose of creating turmoil and disturbing the peace.

These professional troublemakers are not interested in Greenwood, in Leflore County, or in Mississippi. Nor are they truly interested in the welfare of the Negro citizens of that community. Nor are they welcome or wanted by either race. Their sole purpose is to create strife and discord and to overturn the peaceful and harmonious cooperation among the people of the two races built up over generations.

These people, representing the so-called Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, CORE, and other notorious busybodies, had hardly parked their cars in Greenwood before they were sending telegrams to Washington calling for Federal troops.

As is usual in such cases, once the trouble starts these paid professional agitators will be satisfied and will move on elsewhere to start new battles and new tensions, leaving behind them the turmoil and unrest they were paid to create. Unfortunately, they also will leave to the local people of both races the hopeless task of repairing the damage and attempting to restore the peaceful and harmonious cooperation between the races built up over the years.

The people of Greenwood are not responsible for the situation in which they find themselves. They have acted in good faith, with remarkable patience and admirable restraint, under the most extreme provocation.

I am confident the duly constituted law enforcement officers of the city of Greenwood and Leflore County will continue to maintain law and order.

To the degree that I have kept in touch with these gentlemen during this ordeal, I can say that they are carrying this added responsibility, and have uniformly obtained certain assurances which were supported by action from day to day.

I think the public will soon realize what is happening and will no longer follow these schemes of publicity and building up of false issues and the carrying out of such planned provocation.

Instead of the Federal Government filing suits against local authorities, if they are going to be there at all, they ought to be standing side by side or at least encouraging them to follow a pattern of their own law as made by the legislature and as written in the regular constitutional way and in the processes of self-government, and to maintain law and order and orderly processes of government in that way.

Heretofore all the complaint has been directed to the charge that local forces do not maintain law and order. In this case the entire pattern has been within the processes of the law, according to the statutes, and action through duly constituted authority.

If that is not protection through local government and self-government and representative government and free government, I do not know where we can turn for an example of it.

I warn the people of this Nation against taking a superficial and surface impression, artificially created. They should look to the facts and determine the real issues and to get down to the heart of the problem.

Instead of condemning, we should commend. I believe that the filing of suits of injunction against all the officers is an invitation to violence and an invitation for some group outside the law to act for themselves.

I hope that this matter will be reconsidered. In the meantime I urge the people of the city of Greenwood and the county of Leflore, through their officials, to stand their ground and continue, of course, to follow their course as in the past.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield to my colleague from Mississippi.

Mr. EASTLAND. As my colleague realizes, there has been no allegation that an attempt has been made to prevent people from registering.

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator is correct. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill of particulars in the suit that has been filed. Perhaps the Senator has.

Mr. EASTLAND. There has been no allegation of that kind; in fact, 300 persons have applied to register in the past few days. Those who are qualified will be registered. There is no such contention as has been suggested. Outside agitators from New York and other areas talk to Negroes and say, "If you want to get relief, if you want to get social security, if you want to get commodities, come with us." Then they take them in a body and parade them down the street, demonstrating and stopping all traffic, walking through red lights, and being taken to the courthouse. The only obstacle has been that they cannot demonstrate, they cannot stop traffic, they cannot violate the the ordinances of that city. When they reach the courthouse they can go to the clerk's office at any time and make their application, as provided by the laws of our State.

Judge Clayton is a great lawyer. I agree with my colleague that he is one of the great judges of this country. Charley Sampson, the mayor, has rendered distinguished service. The chief of police has done a good job. The city attorney has done a good job. There is no allegation anywhere that an attempt has been made to prevent these people from applying for registration. In fact, they have come forward by the hundreds to do so. They have been there at the instance of outside agitators who say, "You cannot get relief, you cannot get social security, you cannot get commodities unless you follow us, and follow us down the main street, against red lights, and deprive the citizens of the city of the right to govern their own affairs."

The suit which the Department of Justice has filed is not a voting rights suit. The question is, Can the people maintain order on the streets of their own city?

Mr. STENNIS. Through their own officials.

Mr. EASTLAND. Of course; through their own officials. That is the test. Judge Clayton was eminently correct in his decision.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank my colleague.

This situation can come close to home in the case of each of us in Washington in our official offices. It can come much closer home than anyone might think. Only last week some of this same group that is in Greenwood, Miss.—perhaps not the same individuals, but individuals with the same connections—showed up in our offices in the Senate Office Building, to parade and picket and make a show. The way we learned about the probable presence of these people in our offices was through the members of the Senate Press Gallery, who called and said, "Have they gotten there?"

The response was, "Whom are you talking about?"

We were told, "We have been called by this group and they said they were going to picket your offices."

The purpose is to make a show of publicity, to create a disturbance, and to create a false issue, merely to carry a point or to create a disturbance and mislead the American people.

It is pitiful to me—and I say this with the greatest respect to our news media—that items like this can be instantly picked up and publicized in every living room or drawing room, and on every newsstand all over the Nation, causing the public to fall victims to such misleading tactics and to planning of this kind.

It is a severe strain upon free government.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. I live close to the city of Greenwood. I was in Greenwood several days last week. I speak with firsthand knowledge. This demonstration had not caught on. There is not the tension in Greenwood that has been pictured in the eastern press. The movement is not supported by a majority of the Negro race or by a majority of the white race; in fact, it is condemned by a majority of the Negro race. The Justice Department action was merely an attempt to rescue a drowning baby. It is not possible to get citizens of the Negro race from the city of Greenwood to participate. So the instigators have gone into the rural areas and have contacted Negroes who want commodities and have said, "Join with us, and we will lead you to the promised land, provided you march down the street, obstruct traffic, walk a red light, and go to the court house."

Those acts of walking down the street and obstructing traffic are the heart of the suit that has been filed.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

The officers, the board of aldermen, the mayor, the police, the city attorney, and others, are due the commendations and the appreciation of the whole body of people of the Nation, especially those who appreciate the difficulty that is always present when any kind of agitation starts which would try to pit the races one against the other.

I feel certain that every Senator, if he understood the situation, would join with me in heartily commending the action taken by those officials. I hope they will continue their pattern of conduct; I believe they will.

WHY STAND IN THE WAY OF CUBA'S FREEDOM FIGHTERS?

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, yesterday, while the able senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] was criticizing the Cuban refugees for their raids on Castro's Cuba, I engaged in a colloquy with him in which I expressed my sympathy for, and understanding of, these courageous freedom fighters who feel impelled at the risk of their lives to strike whatever blows they can at Castro's totalitarian tyranny and its ruthless and bloody suppression of the liberties of the Cuban people.

While I did not engage in a lengthy discussion with the Senator, who was making his customarily effective presentation of the legal and other aspects of these raids, condemning them unqualifiedly, I sought to indicate my view that there was another side to this issue, and that I was not convinced of the correctness of his view and of the position which the administration appears to be taking that these raids should at all costs be prevented by the United States.

I was therefore interested to note in this morning's Washington Post a column entitled "The Cuban Raids," with the subtitle "Why Stand in the Way?" written by Roscoe Drummond. The article expresses a view with which I find myself in general accord. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CUBAN RAIDS—WHY STAND IN THE WAY?

(By Roscoe Drummond)

Many Americans must feel both confused and frustrated by the difference between what the administration says about Castro's Cuba and what it does.

Unquestionably President Kennedy seeks the goal of a "free Cuba." He told the released Cuban invasion prisoners on their return to Florida that he was confident their battalion flag would fly victoriously in Havana.

But when those Cubans hit at the Castro and Soviet forces, the President wants them to stop it.

Vice President LYNDON JOHNSON tells the graduating class of the Inter-American Defense College that we "cannot be content until communism is gone from Cuba."

But when the Cuban refugees, who are intent upon wresting their freedom from those who have taken it from them, take action to do something about it, the highest officials of the administration express only disapproval.

Thus far President Kennedy has given no adequate explanation as to why he does not want the anti-Castro Cubans to fight the Castro-Soviet forces at any point they can make contact.

Until the administration makes a more persuasive case against the Cuban refugee's harassing their oppressors every chance they get, my instinct is on the side of the refugees.

I think a good case can be made that the refugee raids are useful and that we ought not to discourage them or stand in the way.

We say we want the Castro regime overthrown. We say that only the Cuban people can bring it about. With those two conditions, who is to begin the process unless it is the Cuban refugees?

You may believe that the hit-and-run raids are only insignificant, hectoring pinpricks. So were Castro's first hit-and-run attacks on Batista. The only way to begin is to begin.

Remember Hungary? Surely any prudent man could have told the latent and fermenting Hungarian freedom fighters that it would be fantastically foolhardy for them to consider attacking the occupying Soviet tanks with their bare fists and handmade grenades. But they did. You couldn't have prevented them. And despite the ultimate repression, it was a revolt for freedom which was worth all the bravery that went into it. Hungary is better off today for it.

Admittedly there are risks for the United States in the Cuban hit-and-run raids. Castro might sink an American boat in a spasm of anger. But might it not be better to deal with such an incident than to say that the Cuban freedom fighters must not decide how they shall fight for their freedom?

The administration has said it "will not be content until the last of Soviet forces are withdrawn from Cuban soil." It can be honestly argued that the refugee raids may provide an excuse for Moscow to keep Soviet troops in Cuba. The opposite may be nearer the truth. Is it likely that finding things calm in Cuba will provide any incentive for Khrushchev to call his troops home?

In 1960 Mr. Kennedy proposed that we would do more to help the Cuban resisters both inside and outside Cuba. Now that the refugees are regaining their morale after the Bay of Pigs, it seems ironic, at the very least, that the United States should send the FBI and the Coast Guard after them.

Telling the Cuban resisters what not to o isn't going to further the cause of a free uba. If the administration is convinced at the Cuban refugees are doing it wrong, n at the very least it should be making estions and helping them to do it right.

E SITUATION IN GREENWOOD, MISS.

JAVITS. Mr. President, will the r from Arizona yield, provided he not lose the floor?

Ir. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I d to the Senator from New York, with e understanding that I do not lose the r.

r. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have n informed that while I was at lunch, e distinguished junior Senator from ssissippi [Mr. STENNIS] made a statent on the Senate floor which at least rings into question the propriety of the ction taken by the Attorney General of the United States in connection with the situation in Greenwood, Leflore County, Miss., where the United States is seeking to enjoin local authorities from nterfering with a petition by the local citizenry—Negroes, to be precise—for the redress of grievances.

I express my approval of the action of the Attorney General in instituting he suit. I think it was his manifest duty to do so, in view of the fact that onstitutional rights are brought into uestion, including the right of petition or the redress of grievances by constituted authorities. I approve very much of the Attorney General's taking this action.

As r of general principle, I have th in the processes of the urts. I have argued this d I do so again. In the ns which have such insibilities as in this particabout which the press has so much, the chances will be very better for the processes of order nd tranquillity if an individual citizen feels that tongue may be given for his grievances through the courts, and that there is a possibility of redress.

The Attorney General is in this civil injunction suit proceeding under section 1971 of title 42 of the United States Code, which was part of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The important thing, which I wish to emphasize, is that here is an outlet, here is a substitute for either the effort which the marchers are making or the efforts to stop them which are being made by the police and other municipal authorities. In an area where there are the raw materials of violence, the capability of the courts to act in situations of this kind is designed to head them off and to give, as I say, an outlet, a tongue, to every man's grievance.

Therefore, I have always favored strongly the so-called part III in regard to civil rights, so that the Attorney General might sue in representative cases; and I feel very deeply that this is the way to save ourselves from the dangers involved in such situations—dangers which we have already seen erupt into violence, not only like that which occurred at Oxford, Miss., where marshals and troops are employed, but also the danger involved when people are fired on while they are in their homes and the danger involved when buildings are burned. This is no tea party. This situation is very, very dangerous, in terms of the future of the Nation. So anything we can do to give it a peaceful outlet—and I think recourse to the courts is the most logical and most desirable procedure—we should encourage.

Although I respect, and indeed would fight for, the right of the Senator from Mississippi to say whatever he believes he should say, I also feel it my duty to juxtapose to the general thrust of the statement of the Senator from Mississippi—as I understand it from what I have been told by my assistants who heard him make it—this statement of my own position.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New York that, if I correctly understood him, I am glad he did not substantially contradict the facts I related in regard to the registration—in other words, that the applications were being received and were being passed on, without denying any person the right to file his application in an orderly way and to have it passed on. The Senator from New York does not know of any exception to that general statement, does he?

Mr. JAVITS. I was addressing myself to what we have read in the press about the action of the police and other authorities in blocking and breaking up any march by a number of persons—for example, on one day last week by a group of some 100, and on another by a group of some 42. It is claimed—and the courts will try it out—that in the community there is a climate of intimidation which runs counter to the fundamental provisions of the 1957 Civil Rights Act which prohibit interference with any effort to register and to vote. I say to the Senator from Mississippi that the courts will decide as to that.

For myself, I believe that the path of constitutional propriety is to permit people to march peaceably in order to petition for redress of their grievances.

But the fundamental point I make now is even more limited than that. I only say that if we do not want violence—and I know of no Senator who does want it—in my opinion, people must have an outlet. So I think litigation of this character is a proper and sensible outlet; and I hope very much the Attorney General will prosecute this suit with speed and with diligence.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, let me say that it would be one thing to bring a suit if someone had been denied an opportunity to file an application or to take the examination or to register, or even had protested and had been arrested on that account, or if someone wanted to test the legality of an arrest. But this is a broadside lawsuit, in the absence of an application by anyone to have the law-enforcement machinery used to enjoin such action. It has not been charged that there has been a violation of anyone's right. It is to that point that I addressed my remarks.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I only say that when it appears that in a particular community it would be unhealthy for some persons to register and to vote, the U.S. Government has a right to take action. In my opinion, those who at least seemingly make the situation look unhealthy have the burden to withdraw such barriers.

So I think the Attorney General is taking action in that situation; and I am glad he is doing so by means of action of that kind.

U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—PLAN WITH SOVIET UNION FOR RECIPROCAL BURNING OF OBSOLETE BOMBERS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this time I see on the floor the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. Therefore, I wish to refer now, briefly, to a statement he made yesterday.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], had a number of remarks to make about my efforts to get a straight story from the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency on its plan with the Soviet Union for the reciprocal burning of obsolete bombers. He charged me with doing a "disservice to the cause of peace" by implying that officials of the Disarmament Agency are either guilty of crass dishonesty or are being misunderstood by newspaper reporters. He then went on to make out a case for the fact that the Disarmament Agency officials were misunderstood by newspaper reporters.

Mr. President, the whole episode goes back to March 9, when, in a speech I made in Aurora, Ill., I asked whether it was true that plans were in the making for the reciprocal burning of 30 American B-47's and 30 Russian Badgers, in a giant disarmament demonstration. On March 11, wire service stories which appeared in the newspapers reported:

U.S. Disarmament officials deny that any plan has been shaped for reciprocal burning of bombers by the United States and the Soviet Union.

Now let me quote the reference by the Senator from Pennslyvania to the denial story, in his remarks on the floor yesterday. He said:

This story which appeared in the papers on Monday, March 11, was based on telephone conversations between reporters and the Agency spokesman. These conversations took place on Sunday, March 10. On Monday morning, March 11, the Agency representative who spoke to the press the day before felt after reading the morning papers that his earlier comments to the newspaper correspondents evidently had not been clearly understood. To clarify any misunderstanding the agency at noon that day released the following statement through the State Department.

The statement referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] was that the Disarmament Agency had been engaged in several internal studies, and that among them was the possibility of a simultaneous reduction of B-47's and Russian Badgers.

Before I proceed, Mr. President, let me quote from a press release which the Senator from Pennsylvania issued yesterday in support of his remarks on the floor. Here is what it said, in part:

It is a disservice to the cause of peace to imply that honorable men patriotically and intelligently serving their country are either guilty of crass dishonesty or are being misunderstood by reporters. Neither charge is true. The first suggestion is inaccurate; the second, just plain wrong.

Mr. President, if my suggestion that Disarmament officials are being misunderstood by reporters is "just plain wrong," as the Senator from Pennsylvania claimed, why is it necessary for him to defend the denial story which was based on the conversations with the Disarmament official? Why is it necessary for the Senator from Pennsylvania to point out that, after reading the newspapers, the Disarmament official decided that he had not been clearly understood?

Another point I should like to raise right here is that if—as the Senator from Pennsylvania contended—the Disarmament official hastened to issue a statement clarifying the situation at noon on March 11, why did the press release referred to carry the date of March 12? Could it be that the testimony of Secretary of State Dean Rusk before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on March 11 prodded the Disarmament official to issue a clarification on March 12? In that testimony, Secretary Rusk told the committee that the bomber-destruction plan had been under study and consideration, and that the stories about a denial from the Disarmament Agency must have stemmed from a misunderstanding.

Another point made in the press release by the Senator from Pennsylvania was that the Disarmament Agency told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about the bomber-destruction plan. This raises several questions.

First. If the Disarmament Agency had told the whole truth—including the fact that the bomber-destruction plan about which I inquired had been under discussion—is it likely that competent newspapermen would have been so lacking in understanding that they would have taken that statement to be a flat denial of the plan?

Second. Why did it take the Disarmament Agency 3 days to tell the whole truth?

I submit that the fact remains that I asked a perfectly legitimate question, based on solid information; and the Disarmament Agency answered it in a fashion that caused most newspapers in the United States to publish headlines to the effect that the Government had denied the existence of a bomber-destruction plan. The fact also remains that the Disarmament Agency apparently did not get around to trying to correct this impression until after Secretary of State Rusk had testified that the denial story was erroneous. With the flow of news being what it is today, of course, the Agency's clarification never saw the light of day in any newspaper I read. So the public was left with the impression that the question I had put to the administration had no basis in fact. I say this was as neat an operation in news management—whether wittingly or unwittingly—as any I have witnessed since the New Frontier came into office.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to place in the RECORD two newspaper stories, one from the Washington Post of March 11, 1963, entitled "Plan To Burn 30 Bombers Hotly Denied," and the other from the Washington Star of the same date, entitled "Administration Denies Bomber-Burning Plan."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 11, 1963]

PLAN TO BURN 30 BOMBERS HOTLY DENIED

U.S. disarmament officials denied yesterday that any plan has been shaped for reciprocal burning of bombers by the United States and the Soviet Union.

The disavowal of such plans came as a result of a speech given in Illinois Saturday by Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona, a spokesman for Republican conservatism and a frequent critic of U.S. disarmament negotiations.

GOLDWATER asked, "Is it true that there are plans in the making to give up 30 of our B-47 bombers along with 30 Russian Badgers—that there then would be a gigantic bonfire in which all these weapons would be destroyed for the benefit of mankind?"

GOLDWATER said, "I have heard that the administration is seriously considering a pool with Russia to destroy weapons, item for item." He added this would be "stupid (and) ridiculous."

A spokesman for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency said he is puzzled by GOLDWATER's reference to 30 bombers and hazarded a guess that the Senator might have been confusing it with the figures in a proposed general disarmament treaty suggested by the United States at Geneva last summer.

That draft called for mutual destruction of 30 percent of all basic weapons in the first phase of a move toward general and complete disarmament.

The proposals never got anywhere and one of the chief obstacles was, the spokesman said, that while the Russians agreed that there should be mutual inspection of the destruction of weapons, they rejected further inspection to determine what arms remained. The U.S. position was that there could be no destruction without the right of followup inspection.

The spokesman said that in view of the failure of this broad proposal, there has been some internal discussion within the Government of less ambitious programs as first steps toward a general program which seems many years away.

But, he said, none of these proposals has even been agreed upon internally, let alone offered to the Russians. He noted that destruction of 30 B-47's and 30 Badgers would be no more than a token gesture, in any event, since there are many hundreds of each type in service.

ADMINISTRATION DENIES BOMBER-BURNING PLAN

U.S. disarmament officials deny that any plan has been shaped for reciprocal burning of bombers by the United States and the Soviet Union.

The disavowal of such plans came as a result of a speech given in Illinois Saturday by Senator GOLDWATER of Arizona, a spokesman for Republican conservatism and a frequent critic of U.S. disarmament negotiations.

Senator GOLDWATER asked, "Is it true that there are plans in the making to give up 3[illegible] of our B-47 bombers along with 30 Russia[illegible] Badgers—that there then would be a gigan[illegible] bonfire in which all these weapons would [illegible] destroyed for the benefit of mankind?"

INTERNAL DISCUSSION

The spokesman said that in view of the failure of this broad proposal, there has been some internal discussion within the Govern[illegible]ment of less ambitious programs as firs[illegible] steps toward a general program which seem[illegible] many years away.

But, he said, none of these proposals h[illegible] even been agreed upon internally, let alon[illegible] offered to the Russians. He noted that destruction of 30 B-47s and 30 Badgers—both obsolescent bombers—would be no more than a token gesture in any event since there are many hundreds of each type in service.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I listened with interest to the comments made by my good friend from Arizona. As a result of what he has said, I should like to ask him whether spurned his proposed increase in auto license fees and lopped $70 million off his spending program. He managed to get $35.4 million of a proposed boost in liquor license fees.

▶Oregon Republican Rep. Stafford Hansell proudly sported a tie clasp in the shape of a meat cleaver after GOP Gov. Mark Hatfield charged that the legislature's Joint Ways and Means Committee, to which Hansell belongs, was using a "meat-cleaver approach" to the governor's higher education budget. Hatfield's new state budget totals $405.2 million, an increase of nearly 13 per cent. The jump would be financed by $49 million in new taxes.

Across the nation, surpluses are hard to find. Gov. George Romney of Michigan has one estimated at $34.4 million—the legacy of 1962's nuisance taxes on telephones, cigarettes, and liquor. But the leftover money won't lower taxes; it will be applied against the state general fund's $51.2 million deficit, a burden inherited from the '50s. Romney's first full-year budget aims at producing a surplus of $13.6 million, also to reduce that deficit.

Why the tremendous problems of state spending and taxation? From the standpoint of raising needed funds, Hawaii's state budget analyst Nils Eueki has one answer: "The problem of state budgeting is that the states, unlike the Federal government, can't print money when they need it—they have no means of manipulating the economy." But what hits even harder is the relentless rise in the need to spend, and that reflects the overwhelming phenomenon of the 1960s—the population explosion.

Funds Needed: The major expenses of the states lie in the fields most affected by soaring birth rates and the triumphs of modern medicine: public health, education, welfare, and highways. For twenty years, school-age populations and the numbers of aged Americans have vaulted, while the percentage of the population in the wage-earning—and tax-paying—age brackets has actually declined. At the same time, state governments constantly are asked by local governments to offset education, health, welfare, and transportation costs because the localities are finding it harder to raise more money from local real-estate taxes.

Education gets relatively little Federal aid, but even in fields such as welfare and highways, where Federal grants are available, states often find it hard to come up with the matching funds required by Washington. In Nevada, for example, the Senate Finance Committee rejected participation in the Manpower Development and Training Act because the state would have to pay $172,000 in 1964-65 to enter the Federal program.

Politically, the financial crisis of the state governments is a growing hazard for nationally prominent governors. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown is gambling in his new budget that the Kennedy Administration's proposed tax cut will so stimulate California's economy that he'll be able to collect an additional $100 million to $150 million in tax revenue to balance the budget without new taxes. But will it? Gov. William Scranton of Pennsylvania, who must bridge an estimated $130 million budget gap, probably will have to expand the sales tax to cover such major family purchases as clothing and shoes. If Pennsylvania voters revolt (New York motorists angrily pasted "Don't Tread on Me" stickers on their cars in protest over Rockefeller's auto-fee proposal), Scranton's political future will hardly benefit.

Few of the states' ambitious chief executives can forget that when salesgirls and café cashiers, collecting Texas's new sales tax in 1962, began telling customers, "Give me a penny for Price," the political fate of three-term Democratic Gov. Price Daniel was all but sealed. (Ironically, Daniel had battled against the sales tax for years, accepted it only to prevent the state's finances from collapsing.) In all, thirteen incumbent governors were toppled in 1962, a year when soaring expenditures and the higher taxes they produce were major issues in nearly every one of the nation's 35 gubernatorial elections. Indeed, with such political turnover, the governor's office, while still a traditional steppingstone to the Senate or the White House, is increasingly a possible stumbling block as well.

FEDERAL RESERVE:

Money to Burn

Something was missing at the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco: $7.5 million worth of negotiable U.S. Treasury bonds had vanished from the vaults last July. As bank president Eliot Swan explained it last week, they literally went up in smoke—burned accidentally with the waste paper in the bank incinerator. It was, he said, a "million-to-one human error."

Or was it a $7.5 million-to-one inside job—the biggest theft on record?

The idea was tantalizing. The bank noted that, though some of the bond coupons came due last Nov. 15, no one had tried to cash them. But what if someone had unloaded the bonds abroad at a discount, or deposited them in a foreign account, where they can be drawn on for up to 90 per cent of their face value? The bank, Swan admitted, had considered the possibility of theft; it sat on the story, in fact, for nine months as a matter of "good investigative practice," hoping to keep it quiet until the May 15 maturation date on the bonds had passed. Meanwhile, six employes who had access to the vault took lie-detector tests—and passed.

So the bank settled on its own theory. The twelve bonds—collateral posted by an undisclosed Western bank—were kept in an accordion-pleated Manila envelope with an accounting form on one side. As such forms are filled up, the custom is to put the bonds in a new envelope—and burn the old one. Somehow, Swan thought, the bonds had been burned, too. Federal Reserve rules require that the discarded envelopes be split open first. Even so, Swan said, "nobody is being blamed or disciplined."

No one, apparently, stood to lose; the Federal Reserve issued a credit covering the missing millions, and anyone who tried to cash the bonds when they came due in May would risk almost certain arrest. Besides, Federal investigators agreed with the bank's account: instead of the fattest theft, it was simply the biggest bondfire in U.S. history.

'Mind on Freedom'

Gulf. Miss.

In the first golden glow of spring, Greenwood, Miss., looked like anything but a battleground. The redbud trees blazed along the town streets. At city hall, Mayor Charles Sampson marked the season by sticking an orchid into a 7-Up bottle on his desk. And all around Leflore County, bare-armed Negroes crisscrossed the fields on tractors, breaking the black Delta soil for still another cotton crop.

But Greenwood had become a theater of war, a likely successor to Little Rock and Albany, Ga., and Oxford, Miss., as landmarks in the Negro's long, painful revolt against discrimination. The issue was the right to vote—a right shared by 92.5 per cent of the county's 10,274 eligible whites and only 1.9 per cent of the 13,567 eligible Negroes. If they seemed to be pursuing an abstraction, the Negroes—and their allies in Washington—had come to regard the vote as the key to the bread-and-butter rewards of equality. And they had picked tough, intransigent Leflore County for the facedown—the "testing ground for democracy."

All last week, as they had for seven months, registration canvassers drove the dirt roads after dark, looking for prospects. All week, in increasing numbers, Negroes rallied in their brick and clapboard churches, fortified themselves with speeches and prayers and freedom songs, and marched downtown to register. All week, Leflore fought back, and the strands of tension drew taut.

Night Riders: First, on Sunday night, a fire broke out in the cramped campaign office on McLaurin Street. Tuesday, after dark, night riders trailed 19-year-old George Greene and two fellow canvassers to the Greene home and fired two shotgun blasts. One narrowly missed Greene; the other stitched a dozen holes over a bedroom mantel. Was Greene frightened? "You're gonna die anyway," he shrugged, "so it might as well be for the cause of freedom."

The fire was the second in a month, the shooting the third. But the next morning, 100 Negroes marching from church to city hall to protest met a new adversary: a police dog.

A policeman—one of a dozen lined up outside the buff-brick city hall—held the German shepherd on a long leather leash. Mayor Sampson, a beefy, cigar-puffing member of the segregationist Citizens Council, warned: "I'll give you two minutes to get out . . . If you don't, we are going to turn the dog loose."

The Negroes stood fast, and the police moved in, shoving them back. Lunging into the crowd, the dog knocked one Negro down and ripped open one leg of campaign director Robert Moses' trousers. Police arrested two leaders at the scene on disorderly conduct charges, tailed the others back to church, and prodded nine more into patrol cars. (By the weekend, eight were convicted and given the maximum penalties—four months in jail and $200 fines.) With knots of sullen whites clustered around the courthouse square, the street was barricaded and the registration office closed. But when it reopened that afternoon, 100 Negroes were there, filing inside to fill out registration forms.
